Mr. GEDDES also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Ohio, recommending to Congress the Government inspection of pork in certain cases.

Mr. CONVERSE. I ask for the reading of that resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Senate joint resolution relative to recommending to Congress a Government inspection of pork in certain cases.

Whereas American pork has been excluded from the markets of France and Germany for nearly four years, thereby causing great loss to the hog-raisers of Ohio and other States; and

Whereas the alleged reason for such exclusion (the diseased condition of American pork) we believe to be without foundation in fact: Therefore,

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That we would recommend to our members of Congress a system of Government inspection of meats exported to foreign countries that will prohibit the exportation of all meats not in a healthy condition, or such other legislation, either retaliatory or otherwise, as may be necessary to remove the restrictions now placed by France and Germany upon American pork.

Resolved further, That the governor be requested to forward to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of these resolutions.

L. A. BRUNNER,
Speaker pro tempore of the House of Representatives.
JOHN G. WARWICK,
President of the Senate.

Adopted February 5, 1884.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, OHIO,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I, James W. Newman, secretary of state of the State of Ohio, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of a joint resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio on the 5th day of February, A. D. 1884, taken from the original rolls filed in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal, at Columbus, the 8th day of February, A. D. 1884.

[SEAL.] JAS. W. NEWMAN,
Secretary of State.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I wish to inquire to what committee it is proposed to refer that resolution.

The SPEAKER. To the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic. I wish to say that the distillers are responsible for the diseased condition of American pork.

The SPEAKER. A proposition which has not been reported by a committee is not debatable. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] moves to refer the joint resolution to the Select Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

The motion was not agreed to.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SURVIVORS OF SOUTHERN PRISONS.

Mr. GEDDES also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, requesting their Senators and Representatives in Congress to secure pensions for survivors of prisons of the South during the late rebellion.

Mr. GEDDES. I ask that the joint resolution be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution requesting Senators and Representatives in Congress to secure pensions for survivors of prisons of the South during the late rebellion.

Whereas many Union soldiers, prisoners of war, were confined in Libby, Andersonville, and other Southern prisons during the late war of the rebellion, and by reason of said imprisonment and the consequent sufferings entailed thereby the general health and constitutional vitality of those who survived said imprisonment was so impaired as to bring on a premature breaking down of general health and of the vital powers; and

Whereas it is but simple justice to those deserving and patriotic men that their strong claims to the sympathy of the country should receive such recognition as their merit, suffering, and patriotic services demand: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Ohio are hereby requested to use their influence in the Congress of the United States to procure the passage of an act granting pensions to those surviving soldiers, prisoners of war, confined in Southern prisons as above recited.

Resolved further, That the governor be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to each of our Senators and members in Congress a copy of these resolutions.

Mr. MAYO. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAYO. In the discussion upon this floor of the Manning and Chalmers case on Friday last Mr. GEORGE D. WISE, the Representative from the first Congressional district of Virginia, traveled out of his way from that case to make an unwarranted and unnecessary attack on my case, and one not supported by one scintilla of proof. He makes use of this most remarkable language:

> Now, let us see if these cases are parallel. I state here that I was present and know, and the papers in the record also show, that according to the returns George D. Garrison was elected from the first district of Virginia.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MAYO. Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON. It is this: As this is a personal matter, and GEORGE D. WISE, of Virginia, is not present, allow me to suggest to the gentleman that he defer any remarks until Mr. WISE is present.

Mr. MAYO. I will do so, reserving my privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not decided that it is a question of privilege, not yet having heard stated the precise question to which the gentleman proposes to direct his remarks. But the Chair will recognize the gentleman hereafter.

Mr. MAYO. I will say that I was not here when the attack was made on me.

ELECTION CONTEST FROM MICHIGAN.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It is a question of privilege relative to the right of a member of this House to occupy his seat. I received last Friday by mail a petition, which I hold in my hand, from a distinguished citizen and the foremost lawyer of the State of Michigan, claiming that one of the sitting members from that State is not entitled to his seat by reason of having been illegally elected, and claiming the seat for himself. I find in the Revised Statutes a mode of procedure provided for contestants, as follows:

Whenever any person intends to contest an election of any member of the House of Representatives of the United States he shall, within thirty days after the result of such election shall have been determined by the officer or the board of canvassers authorized by law to determine the same, give notice, in writing, to the member whose seat he designs to contest of his intention to contest the same, and, in such notice, shall specify particularly the grounds upon which he relies in the contest.

The statute also goes on to provide the mode of the future procedure in the case, the manner of taking testimony, the time granted to each party for the purpose, &c.

This gentleman makes in his petition statements which he says he will prove to be true, and which, if true, in my humble judgment will unseat the sitting member.

He did not comply with the requirements of this section of the Revised Statutes which I have read; but in his petition he gives the reason why he did not. He states that about the middle of October, previous to the election of 1882, he was taken sick.

Mr. STEELE. We can not hear the gentleman.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Come down here if you want to hear me.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will resume their seats and preserve order. [After a pause.] The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I was stating that the petitioner did not file notice of contest within the time prescribed by law. Whether he has given such notice since the time I am not advised. In his petition he states the reason why he did not give the notice within the time prescribed; that upon the 11th day of October, previous to the election, he was taken sick and was confined to his bed until long after the time had elapsed in which he should have given the notice. He also states that he did not know all the facts, which he sets up in his petition to be true, until a long time after his recovery and he was able to attend to business.

Mr. CALKINS. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALKINS. If the paper to which the gentleman refers is a simple petition or memorial, it should go through the petition-box, as other petitions do.

The SPEAKER. There is no difficulty about the matter. The Chair was waiting to ascertain the question of privilege. The right of petition is secured to every citizen by the Constitution itself. The gentleman can present the petition in the manner prescribed by the rules, and it will go to the Committee on Elections. That is a right which does not depend upon any explanation which the gentleman may make.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I would like to have the petition read and referred to the Committee on Elections; that is all I ask.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reading of the petition? Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the reading of the petition, and it will be placed in the petition-box, and be referred to the Committee on Elections, taking the usual course.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEELE. I now demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for. This being the third Monday of the month, the regular order is the call of committees for motions to suspend the rules.

Mr. CALKINS. I appeal to my colleague [Mr. STEELE] to withhold his demand for the regular order, to allow those of us who were not present when their States were called to introduce bills for reference.

Mr. STEELE. I will withdraw the demand for the regular order for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. If the regular order is not insisted on, the Chair will, with the consent of the House, recognize for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions members who were not in the Hall when their States were called.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to introduce, for reference, a House resolution.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done at this time. The Chair is by consent continuing the call for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions.

Mr. WILLIS introduced a bill (H. R. 5226) for the government and control of the Louisville and Portland Canal; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask the opinion of the Chair as to the propriety of referring this bill to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. The question is between that committee and the Committee on Commerce. The latter committee are of the opinion that they have no jurisdiction of the matter. The Louisville and Portland Canal is the connecting link in the navigation of the Ohio River; and I suppose the reference would naturally be to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill will be so referred.

There being no objection, the bill was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order having been withdrawn temporarily to permit the continuation of the introduction of bills and joint resolutions by members who were not present when their States were called, and such call having now been concluded, the Chair, in pursuance of the regular order, will call the committees for motions to suspend the rules, this being the third Monday.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

Mr. DORSHEIMER (when the Committee on the Judiciary was called). Mr. Speaker, under instructions from the Committee on the Judiciary I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That House bill 2418, entitled "An act granting copyrights to citizens of foreign countries," be made a special order for February 27, immediately after the morning hour, and continued from day to day thereafter until finally disposed of, not, however, to take precedence of appropriation or revenue bills.

Mr. DEUSTER and Mr. GUENTHER demanded a second.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Would it be in order to call for the reading of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House. It can be read, of course, by unanimous consent.

A second having been demanded, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. DEUSTER and Mr. DORSHEIMER were appointed tellers.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Can a second not be considered as ordered?

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. GUENTHER. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the tellers will take their places.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 134, noes 38.

So the motion was seconded.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House there are thirty minutes allowed for debate, fifteen of which will be controlled by the gentleman from New York and fifteen by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DEUSTER].

Mr. CALKINS. May I ask to have the bill read before the debate begins?

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Let me say to the gentleman from Indiana that this is simply a motion to make this bill a special order for one week from next Wednesday.

Mr. CALKINS. I understand that the object of the resolution is to fix a day for the consideration of the bill, but as there has been some considerable difference of opinion already manifested as to the propriety of taking it up, I should like to know what it is.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reading of the bill.

Several members objected.

Mr. DEUSTER. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill, and this morning I inquired at the document-room for the report accompanying it and could not find a single copy, but was informed that the gentleman from New York in charge of the bill had withdrawn the report from the Printing Office and there is no report to be had. Under these circumstances I think a bill of this importance should not be brought before the House for consideration, certainly not until members have had an opportunity of examining the report on which it is based.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I will say to the gentleman that the report has been placed in the hands of the Printer, and will be on the tables of members to-morrow. It is now in the hands of the Public Printer.

Mr. DEUSTER. I do not deem it necessary now, Mr. Speaker, to enter into a full discussion of the merits of the bill, but will do so when it shall be called up for action before the House. For the present I wish to have read as a part of my remarks what I send to the desk.

Mr. CANNON. Permit me to ask, Mr. Speaker, whether this bill can not be read for the information of the House?

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House for consideration, and, as the Chair understands, objection has been made to reading it.

Mr. DEUSTER. I ask the Clerk to read the extract which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

A SCHEME TO MAKE BOOKS DEAR.

The bill for an international copyright, introduced by Representative DORSHEIMER, of New York, for which the American Copyright Association is lobbying in Congress, is a bill to make books dear. Leaving aside all pretense and disguise, that is the intention of it.

It is advocated under the attractive caption of "Reciprocity." But there can be no reciprocity between the United States and other nations in the protection of authors. There are scores of foreign authors read in this country to one of ours read abroad. The advantages of the international copyright must be sought elsewhere than in one-sided reciprocity.

The rights of authors are pushed forward to gain support for the bill. The rights of authors are like those of other laborers—to sell their products in the best market they can find. That they have any right to have markets manufactured for them by copyright or by any other process we can not see. Copyright is an artificial thing, not a matter of abstract justice. Its extension, like its institution, depends on considerations of public policy, or perhaps of public generosity, merely.

The passage of this law would at once be followed by the partition of the American book market among a limited number of publishers. Books would be published in three-volume editions and at high prices, as in England. Domestic copyright has this disadvantage, as was seen in the case of Prescott's works, which were published in expensive editions and at high prices. The book-buyer who now puts $1 in his pocket would after the enactment of such a law need to go to his book-seller with $5. Literary knowledge and art have been made cheap in this country by free trade in intellectual importations. Stop this free trade, and books will advance in price to the English standard.

Those American authors who advocate this international copyright on the low ground that they want protection from the competition of foreign authors are deceiving themselves as to the help any such law would give them. The foreign writer would still sell for a comparatively small sum the right to publish his works in a remote and in most cases unappreciative market. He would make better terms with the publisher than the native author, and this underbidding would always be brought up against the native by his natural enemy, the publisher. Our writers think themselves hurt now by the sale of the pirated reprints; they would find themselves hurt under a reciprocal copyright by the low prices at which foreign authors would sell their books to the American publisher.

The only ground that remains on which to support an international copyright is that of abstract right. It is argued that it is stealing to appropriate the cerebral labor of another as much as to appropriate the fruits of his manual labor. This view of the case at first seems lofty and generous and captures many adherents for international copyright. But there is no abstract right involved. If there were, copyright would be perpetual. A man's rights in the books he had made would descend like those in the house he had built to his posterity forever, inalienable except by gift or sale. Shakespeare's family, unless they had parted with it, would still have the right to a payment from every occupant of Shakespeare's literary constructions.

Considerations of expediency and public policy have induced the state to give certain property rights in literary productions for a limited area and for a limited time. Public policy forbids, in our view, the extension of copyright at this time, so as to give foreign authors advantages that could not possibly be reciprocated to American authors abroad. It forbids the introduction of a system that would give the American author a delusive protection, while it would subject the great reading public to the possibility of a combination that would almost certainly make books dear. No property rights are involved, for no international rights in literary property have yet been created.—Chicago Tribune, February 9, 1884.

Mr. GUENTHER. I wish the Clerk to state the name of the paper from which he has been reading.

The CLERK. The Chicago Tribune of February 9, 1884.

Mr. DEUSTER. Mr. Speaker, the United States is not, like Europe, the land of monopolies, but the land of liberty. Political and social liberty, however, is not complete without the fullest freedom of exchange of thought, and this freedom is not alone based on the liberty of the press, but finds its most perfect expression and safeguard in the free and untrammeled exchange of the literature of all nations. Whatever impedes this free exchange interferes with the great fundamental ideas of mankind—universal freedom and fraternization of all nations. International copyright is a European institution, but even in Europe we would seek its advocates in vain among the men of science.

I repeat, the United States is not the land of monopolies, but the powerful protector of free competition. America, acting in accordance with this principle, offers to all countries from which it draws intellectual succor a full equivalent; it says to the whole civilized world, reprint any of our works you will, and cull what pleases you. The interests of popular education and fraternization of nations suffer no intellectual monopoly, but demand the fullest spread of knowledge all over the world and the untrammeled exchange of the literature of all countries without let or hinderance.

American authors enjoy a greater remuneration for their labors than those of any other nation, and do not need protection against foreign reprint. But to tax the people of the United States for the benefit of European authors would be as manifestly unjust as to tax us for the benefit of European statesmen, generals, &c. Upon every nation devolves the duty of seeing its authors sufficiently well paid. This duty is discharged in the United States directly, because they are enabled by the people themselves, who read more than the people of Europe, by the increased prosperity arising from free institutions, to secure not only bodily but intellectual food in abundance. Consequently, very much larger editions are demanded, and this enables publishers to pay authors more liberally than is done in Europe.

If European authors are desirous of obtaining greater remuneration let them labor for free institutions, and the success of their efforts will increase reading and the sale of books. At present in Europe the larger number of readers are dependent upon the circulating libraries for their instruction or amusement, and these furnish but poor substitutes for purchased books, and are really an obstacle to intellectual development, for such books only can be procured from them as their managers see proper to furnish, and that only for a limited time; and further, the existence of these circulating libraries prevents the publication of large editions of popular works, such as are issued in America.

A free people is always a thinking and a reading people; and in the same proportion as the freedom of a nation is developed, so its desire to read develops itself, and also the pecuniary ability to gratify that desire by purchasing books.

No people read more than the American people, thanks to their free institutions, and thanks, also, to their magnificent free-school system. The American people educate readers—educate them with funds provided by the people. And after a reading public is thus formed, which has no equal upon earth, should the same people who have brought about this result by taxing themselves willingly for so noble a purpose—who have rendered possible so grand and vast a system of popular education—who have created this thirst for knowledge, and consequent market for literature by their peerless liberality—should this very people be taxed again in the interest of a few authors and publishers, who, as long as the literary market in the United States was still in its infancy, did nothing toward its development?

I am opposed to the passage of this bill, because all the publishers of reprints in the United States, the printers, paper manufacturers, type and stereotype founders, bookbinders, and many thousands of workmen employed in the production of reprinted works, would lose their occupations and their daily bread. Again, the price of works of European origin reprinted here would, in the absence of all competition, rise so enormously as to deprive nine-tenths of those who now purchase them of the ability to do so. The people of the United States would be most unjustly taxed in favor of a few authors and publishers, and, by reason of the people having less ready access to European literature, the progress in intellectual culture would be impeded; and last, but not least, the United States, upon which the world now looks as the protector of universal free institutions, would, by the passage of an international copyright law, set an example which could not but operate unfavorably upon other countries now in process of development.

The custom which now obtains with American publishers of publishing new European works from advance sheets, for which they pay the author a remuneration, has heretofore proved sufficient for the purposes for which the passage of an international copyright law is claimed, and has, at the same time, established no monopoly; has not unduly taxed the people of the United States, and, while it has erected no barrier to intellectual progress, it has been remunerative to both publishers and authors. Why should not, then, this solution of the question of international copyright for the future as in the past answer all ends, and satisfy all reasonable claims which authors and publishers have on the public?

I believe the American people have a right to hope that the representative wisdom of the nation in Congress assembled will refuse to pass an international copyright law.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed in opposition to the resolution has been exhausted. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] is entitled to fifteen minutes in support of the resolution.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I will state to the House I have no intention at the present time to enter into a discussion of the merits of this bill. The question before the House now is simply whether the bill shall be assigned to a particular day in the future and be made a special order until it is disposed of. I do not desire to occupy any time myself, but yield the floor for such time as he may desire to my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. CHACE. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill in its present shape. But this is a matter which in my apprehension presses, or ought to press, upon the conscience of the Legislature of this country. This thing interests not only authors, but printers, publishers, and a variety of people whose livelihood depends on the industries which authors provide by the creation of their brains.

I do not propose to enter into the question of whether the creation of a man's brain is property corporeal or incorporeal, or whether it is a matter of abstract right or other right. But this is a question under which we as a nation are suffering; and the most intelligent and the most conscientious people in the world, not only in our own country but elsewhere, are pointing the finger of scorn at us for refusing to recognize a right which is everywhere else recognized. I want this may be considered, and I want when it is considered that this bill may be largely amended. And if when it is considered gentlemen on the other side of this House, who will undoubtedly control it, are willing to take the responsibility of cutting off the bread and butter, so to speak, of a large class of the labor of this country, very well, so be it; there shall the responsibility rest. But it is a duty which we owe to ourselves and to our people that we should give to this question a day and a hearing.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CHACE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman be kind enough to tell me wherein this bill is so important and so urgent that the rules should be suspended and it should have a special day to the exclusion of all other important business?

Mr. CHACE. In reply to my friend from Illinois I simply say that that is another way of attacking the rules of this House which has been adopted by the majority on the other side of the House; and the representatives of that majority are now coming and asking us to suspend those rules. We tried diligently and earnestly to get a change made in those rules; and this is a very apt illustration of the necessity of the change we urged. Now they admit, by asking that this question be fixed for a certain day, that their rules are faulty. I agree with my friend from Illinois as to that.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman permit me to say that it is not a question as to whether the rules are faulty, but whether under the rules this is a matter of such transcendent importance that the rules should be set aside?

Mr. CHACE. I do not claim this is a matter of transcendent importance. But I do claim that a question of morality is something of a question even to this country. I think we owe it to ourselves to provide safeguards not only for our own authors but for others. We want foreign literature, and we want to protect our own authors at the same time.

Mr. RICE. Does my friend from Rhode Island think morality would be promoted by increasing the price of books and preventing our own publishers from giving cheap editions of foreign authors?

Mr. CHACE. Not in the least. I have no such object in view. I have said distinctly if this bill shall be considered I shall be most earnest in seeking to get it amended.

Mr. RICE. This bill stands early on the Calendar. Why displace other important matters to give it premature consideration?

Mr. CHACE. The gentleman from Massachusetts knows very well this is probably the only way we shall get a consideration of this question.

Mr. REED. Our rules were intended to kill bills, and why should they not be left to operate as intended?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, the Chair understood, yielded five minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE]. That time has been occupied.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I yield two or three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON].

Mr. KASSON. This bill presents a question which it is important to us to discuss, that we may understand distinctly what is the American position on this question. It will come before us every Congress until it has been intelligently discussed and defeated or adopted. I want that discussion to come now, early in the session, when we are not pressed with other business. I shall therefore vote to have that discussion at this early day on the 27th of February.

Unless the bill is modified in some particulars—for example, in respect, as I understand it, to books printed in foreign countries, and secondly with a limitation upon the right of the foreigner to withhold the book from publication in this country—I cannot support it. But for the purpose of considering the question, and of adjusting, if possible, the rights of authors and the rights of business men on this question, I desire this question may be discussed. It has been reported early from the Committee on the Judiciary. It is entitled to be considered. I condemn the rules which the majority still force upon us, that prevent us from getting proper legislation except under such a motion as this to suspend the rules. It is the only power left to us to get at it. And I hope the majority will occasionally recognize the request of the minority, who may be specially interested in getting a bill up for consideration, as we now, some of us at least, intend to recognize the request of the gentleman who represents the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I will state on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary the reason why it asks the House to make this the order for an early day was that the committee was informed that neither the Committee on Appropriations nor the Committee on Ways and Means would be likely to have any business with which the consideration of this bill at the time proposed would interfere. It was thought desirable by the committee that the bill should be brought up for consideration and for final disposition before the House was so involved in the business coming from the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations as to make the consideration of the bill at this session improbable.

This bill has passed through the Judiciary Committee, for although one gentleman of that committee was not willing to vote in favor of the bill at the time when his vote was asked, yet he did not vote against it nor express dissent.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] will permit me, as the member of the committee to whom he doubtless refers——

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Certainly.

Mr. REED. What I did say to the committee was that I had not had an opportunity to examine the bill, and while I would not vote against it, I must not be understood by my silence as assenting to it.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. So I understood, and do not wish any other implication to be made here. At its meeting last Friday the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously instructed me to submit this motion, and I have submitted it in pursuance of the unanimous instructions of the Committee on the Judiciary.

I hope that this House, not at present greatly occupied with pressing matters, before the tariff bill shall have been matured in the Committee on Ways and Means and before a greater volume of appropriation bills shall be presented for our attention, will take up and give respectful consideration to the reasons upon which this bill is founded. The object of the bill is not to protect American authors, nor to protect any other interests, but to recognize a right of property which our laws have in part long recognized. At the present time there is no civilized country, except the United States, which does not recognize in some form the right of property which a foreign author has in his works. The United States now stands the only country in the world refusing to foreign authors a right which the laws of this country accord to native authors.

What the considerations are why this bill should pass, what injustice, if any, it works, and what a high justice it would work out if it shall become a law, are considerations which will be amply presented when the bill comes up for discussion; but I do not think the present the proper time to enter into such discussion. I hope the gentleman will at least give to the Committee on the Judiciary the right to a hearing, and at an early day. If the day named by the committee is not a convenient one, I would be willing to receive suggestions upon that point. But if the day is thought to be convenient by the House, I trust gentlemen will give us an opportunity to discuss this bill and to lay before the House for proper consideration the reasons which have influenced the Committee on the Judiciary in recommending its adoption.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say that I believe in the doctrine of international copyright, and have long wished to see it put into execution. But I do not believe in giving to foreign publishers, as a rider to the granting of copyright, the privilege of making our books and determining what books we shall have.

I rise, therefore, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] whether a week later than the day named by him would not answer his purpose and that of the committee reporting this bill. That will give our own authors, publishers, and bookmakers an opportunity to make themselves heard.

The interests which would be affected by this bill, if my judgment of its scope be correct, are very large. They involve those of our papermakers, of our printers in all the various branches, of the great number of the best workmen and best designers in the world, admittedly so by all the world, who make the illustrations of our books, and also the interests of every department of book-binding, &c.

I think that a full fortnight should be given to the parties connected with these material interests to make themselves heard before we may be called upon hurriedly by the majority to vote upon this bill. When the Committee on Ways and Means shall have reported——

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] that the resolution having been reported by instructions of the Committee on the Judiciary, the date named therein can not be changed except by unanimous consent. But I will say to the gentleman that so far as I am myself concerned, if by postponing the consideration of the bill for one week all opposition on that side of the House will be withdrawn to its consideration, I am perfectly willing to make the change.

Mr. KELLEY. I can not speak for others, but I am quite ready to have the time fixed for Wednesday fortnight instead of Wednesday week.

Mr. CHACE. There are some other questions which are likely to arise that we may want that day for.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed under the rule for debate has expired. Is there objection to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] that the time designated for the consideration of the bill which has been read shall be changed from February 27 to March 5?

Mr. ANDERSON. I object.

Mr. MILLER. Oh, no; do not object. Let us have a vote on the question.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Then I call for the question.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made to the change suggested, the question now is, Shall the rules be suspended and the resolution adopted?

Mr. ANDERSON. At the suggestion of friends I will withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again submit the proposition. Is there further objection to the change suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], that the day fixed in the resolution, the 27th of February, for the consideration of the bill be changed to the 5th day of March?

Mr. GUENTHER. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which has been read, which requires a two-thirds vote.

The question was taken by a viva voce vote, but before the result was announced,

Mr. DEUSTER and Mr. GUENTHER called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were—ayes 29, noes 90.

So (more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 156, nays 99, not voting 65; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries; who also announced that the President had approved and signed joint resolutions and bill of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 24) authorizing the printing of 2,500 extra copies of the report of the health officer of the District of Columbia;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 152) for the relief of E. H. George and H. W. Walker;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 160) making further appropriations for the relief of destitute persons in the districts overflowed by the Ohio River and its tributaries; and

An act (H. R. 3948) making appropriations to supply deficiencies on account of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, in regard to rebate of tax on tobacco, and to provide for the expenses of the meeting of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes.

RETIREMENT OF TRADE-DOLLAR.

Mr. DOWD. By direction of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, I move that the rules be suspended for the purpose of adopting the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That House bill 4976, for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar, be made a special order in the House for Tuesday, March 11, 1884, immediately after the morning hour, and so continue from day to day until disposed of, not to interfere with regular appropriation or revenue bills.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I demand a second.

Mr. DOWD. If I have the power, I will yield to a second.

Mr. BUCKNER. There being no objection, a second can be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the second must be considered as ordered. Under the rules fifteen minutes are allowed for debate to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOWD] and fifteen minutes to those opposed to the resolution. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERMENTROUT] called for a second and is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. The resolution, Mr. Speaker, proposes to fix the 11th of March next for the consideration of the bill reported by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures for the redemption and retirement of what is commonly known as the trade-dollar. I do not rise to oppose the passage of any bill looking to the redemption and retirement of the trade-dollar and I am in favor of the provisions of this bill, but I do oppose and protest against the fixing of so late a day as the 11th of March for the consideration and disposal of this important matter. Speaking in the name of the constituency I represent upon this floor I ask for the earliest possible action. Among them the 1st of April is a great day for exchanges of all kinds. Then mortgages are canceled, judgments paid, money put out at interest, and all other matters of a like character settled and adjusted for the year. This is the case to a very large extent in Pennsylvania and I doubt not in many other States. There are millions of trade-dollars in the pockets of the people awaiting the passage of this measure.

A VOICE. Regular order.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. If the gentleman has anything to say let him come to the front so I may see who he is, otherwise I hope he will not interrupt me.

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, there is no necessity for any so long delay in our action upon this bill as the 11th day of next March. I do not believe, indeed, there are ten men in this House who would oppose the passage of a bill for the redemption and retirement of the trade-dollar. Public sentiment demands it, the national authorities have recommended it, and in this House no less than a dozen bills for that purpose have been referred to various committees. The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures has reported back one bill and the Committee on Banking and Currency another. To those gentlemen who propose fixing the 11th of March as the day for taking the measure up for consideration I will suggest to them to take a lesson from the experience of the past. You already have on your list of special orders the bill from the Committee on Agriculture relating to pleuro-pneumonia. That order was asked for on the 31st of January, 1884, and the 5th day of February was set down for its consideration and disposal. It was taken up at that time, but it is still hanging by the eyelids undisposed of. Here we have a delay of thirteen days. That special order and all other special orders set down in advance of the day now proposed would take precedence, so that when we reach the 11th of March we would have no assurance that this measure will be taken up for consideration and action. We would not only be in danger of preceding special orders, but also in danger of appropriation bills being called up and reports from the Committee on Ways and Means, which would necessarily engross and exhaust the time of the House to a very late period of the session. It certainly would delay the passage of any bill for the redemption of the trade-dollar long after the 1st of April. This would be a serious inconvenience and a positive loss to those I have the honor to represent and to thousands in Pennsylvania, and perhaps other States.

There can be no necessity for consuming a whole day of this House in discussing a measure like this. Everybody understands it, and I undertake to say now that if the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures had not interfered with the bill on that subject referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency on the 22d of January and directed to be reported within ten days thereafter, it would now be before the House and on its final passage. I was authorized by the Committee on Banking and Currency to move to suspend the rules on this very day and put that bill on its passage, and no longer time would have been taken up in doing that than will be consumed over this resolution fixing a day for the consideration of the subject.

I ask the gentleman from North Carolina to consent that an earlier day shall be fixed. It does not require much discussion. In 1882, on the 19th of June, a Republican House passed this measure under a suspension of the rules with no one dissenting. No time should be lost, and an earlier day should be fixed. Let it be to-morrow. Let the gentleman from North Carolina modify his motion, if he will, so as to put the bill upon its passage now. [Cries of "Pass the bill now!"] I appeal to the gentleman to ask consent to put the bill on its passage at this time. I make that request.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I object.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. Then let us have an earlier day fixed for its consideration. Say to-morrow.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield to me a portion of his time.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I desire to reserve a portion of my time. I will yield to the gentleman presently. I wish to say further, Mr. Speaker, that there should have been no collision or contest between the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures and the Committee on Banking and Currency in reference to this important measure. The Committee on Banking and Currency were ready to report when they were informed that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures would, in all probability, submit a report on the subject. I took the precaution to inform the members of that committee that we were authorized to confer with them and to agree to such amendments as would meet with the joint approval before moving for suspension of the rules. It is a most important measure, in our judgment, and ought to pass the House immediately. Of course, under the circumstances, I shall be compelled, in the absence of any earlier time, to vote for the pending resolution. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER], chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and shall reserve the remaining portion.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the bill is which it is proposed to take up for consideration, but I have no doubt if it were permitted to come before the House at this time it would pass with very little discussion; and I say this although I have not seen it, but because I have such confidence in the members of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. If that bill provides for retiring from circulation the trade-dollar, and putting it into the melting-pot of the mint, however we may differ about details, I do think the House would pass the bill by a large majority. It did that. A bill of that sort—I do not know whether it was as good a bill or a worse bill than the one which is now proposed—but it did, as my friend said, pass a bill of that character without any dissent. I doubt now whether there would be any dissent to the passage of this bill. I think the primary object is to get rid of this abnormal circulation, and so far as the details are concerned, so that this coin gets into the mint and is melted up it does not matter whether it is converted into subsidiary coin or into the standard silver dollar. There is one thing certain, that whatever may be the details of it we ought to get rid of this circulation. I am in favor of that, and I hope it will be done.

Now look at it. Let me call attention to the condition of the business before this House. I regret to say it, Mr. Speaker, but it is a fact, and the observation of every one here will bear me out, that this House is further behind with its business at the present time than at any time for ten years past as far as I can recollect. We are now near the 1st of March, when the short session of Congress is ready to adjourn, having disposed of all of the appropriation bills as a rule. But at present we have not got through with the first appropriation bill; and we must, if we propose to do anything to expedite the business of this session, cut off this lengthy debate on all questions of no very great moment. Hence I should vote, and I believe two-thirds of the House would vote for it now. I would vote for it blindfolded, because the mere effect of it is to get rid of this circulation, and that is the object we all have in view.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I apprehend that the two minutes allotted to me will be the only portion of the entire time occupied in the discussion of this resolution in opposition to the bill which it proposes to consider, because I see——

Mr. BLAND. I am opposed to it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I beg pardon. I had forgotten that my friend from Missouri who will have the floor occupies a similar position on this bill to that of myself.

I am opposed to the bill in its present form, and shall feel it my duty to vote against it unless it be amended in a manner which I shall presently suggest. Until within the last twelve months, Mr. Speaker, the trade-dollar has been in circulation among the people, as gentlemen here are aware, at about par and side by side with the standard silver dollar. It was a coin then in quite general circulation among the masses of the people. It passed current from hand to hand without discount. During the last summer the banks repudiated the trade-dollar and refused to accept it across their counters. Many of the merchants of the country, following the behest of the banks, also declined to receive it in settlement of accounts. What was the result? As a consequence the trade-dollar depreciated to its bullion value; and the masses of the people, in whose possession it happened to be when this depreciation took place, were forced to bear the loss, parting with the coin at a rate of from 80 to 85 cents on the dollar. Then the sharp brokers, jobbers, and speculators, believing there would be some such legislation as this, bought up these trade-dollars at their depreciated value and hold nearly the whole amount to-day.

Now, as soon as this coin has gotten into the hands of these people there is a strong pressure brought to bear upon Congress for its redemption on a par with the standard silver dollar. As long as this coin passed from hand to hand and was current among the people of this country there was no considerable effort made in Congress to redeem it at par or at its face value. But as soon as it gets into the hands of the money-lenders, brokers, and speculators then the cry comes up from every part of the land where these people can originate a petition urging their redemption at par.

Unless, therefore, that part of the bill is stricken out which provides for their redemption at par I shall oppose the bill. What is fair and just to the tax-payers of this country is to provide that the trade-dollar shall be exchanged at its bullion value. Then the speculators who hold it will get as much in return as it cost them. The loss by reason of its depreciation has already been borne by the people who were forced by the banks to part with them at their depreciated value.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. DOWD. Mr. Speaker, I have no difficulty as to this question of jurisdiction which has been referred to by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERMENTROUT]. So far as I am individually concerned I am ready to vote now upon the bill to which the resolution relates. Individually I ask for no time whatever to consider it. But, sir, this committee, for whom I am now speaking, were unanimous in the belief in one thing, and that is that this bill should not be attempted to be galloped through the House under a suspension of the rules, but should have fair discussion and full opportunities for debate.

Now, there is a marked difference of opinion with regard to the merits of the bill. I believe that there is a minority report which has been already printed; at all events leave was granted to file a minority report. I tell my friend from Pennsylvania so far from letting this bill go through as he proposes under a suspension of the rules, I apprehend that if that was proposed at this time the bill would be voted down. The committee wanted the bill considered in the House and debated, and at some convenient time sufficiently far off to give ample opportunity for preparation on the part of members who wish to be heard and at the same time not so near as to prejudice the rights of the present holders of the coin.

I yield now five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, this proposition shows, and I wish to call the attention of the House to it, what I may be permitted to call the viciousness of legislation that may sometimes be had under a suspension of the rules. It is true that the last Congress passed a bill on this subject. What was that bill? It was a bill providing that this trade-dollar should be taken in and exchanged for standard silver dollars and counted as among the monthly purchases of bullion by the Treasurer. What is the effect of that? The law requires a certain amount of bullion to be purchased per month, not that $2,000,000 should be coined per month, but that $2,000,000 per month should be purchased at bullion rates. That amount will coin 2,300,000 standard dollars. But under the bill that passed the last Congress these trade-dollars were counted par as purchases, and we would have lost $300,000 on every 2,000,000 of trade-dollars. It was a bill that ought not to have passed this Congress.

How many trade-dollars are out? The Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of the Mint suppose about 8,000,000. Financial gentlemen in New York estimate the quantity at 10,000,000. We know there have been somewhere near 36,000,000 of trade-dollars coined.

Suppose these trade-dollars all come in and are counted against the bullion fund, what is the effect of it? Why, for one year that you are coining trade-dollars you stop the purchase of bullion, and bullion depreciates in the market and goes down so low that the enemies of silver will declare it a base metal, and insist on stopping the coinage of silver.

Talk about rushing a bill through this House under suspension of the rules that will affect probably $36,000,000! I am astonished that gentlemen should moot such a proposition, and especially so when the effect might be to stop the monthly purchases of bullion for twelve months in this country, and depreciate silver so much that the argument would be very grave for its total demonetization.

No, sir, the House will do no such thing. It is due to the House and to the importance of the subject that a day be set for the consideration of the bill. I care not what day it is. But certainly a matter of this vast importance should receive the consideration of this House and not be rushed through under whip and spur. There are gentlemen here who believe speculators hold these dollars and that they ought not to be redeemed at par at all. I for one am opposed to redeeming them in that way if they are to be counted against the bullion fund in the monthly purchases of bullion.

There are various phases in which the question will come up for our consideration, and if gentlemen think they can pass a bill of this character of such vast importance under a suspension of the rules they are very much mistaken. It can not be done.

Mr. CHACE. Is not the gentleman in favor of a day being fixed for the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLAND. I am in favor of fixing a day, and I care not how soon, when the House should consider the subject. But I do not want a bill trotted through as in the last Congress, the effect of which would have been in my opinion to demonetize silver.

Mr. DOWD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. CHACE. I do not know that I can add much to what has been said in regard to this matter. I regret exceedingly my friend from Pennsylvania of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. ERMENTROUT] should feel it his duty to oppose this matter. I am sure, if I understand the character of the bill which the gentleman expects to report, it is in effect very similar to this.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. Exactly; there is no question about that.

Mr. CHACE. It seems to me, therefore, the point of the gentleman's objection is lost.

Now, in so far as the question of the general merits of this bill are concerned, while I do not wish to do any injustice to the gentleman from Missouri, the chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures [Mr. BLAND], yet I must say that, according to my apprehension of the effect of his language, it is certainly calculated on a fair construction to mislead the House in one regard. I see how this measure might possibly have some slight effect upon the purchase of bullion; but how it could stop the purchase of bullion for twelve months in this country when there are only out—the most the gentleman puts it at—$10,000,000 is surely beyond my comprehension.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman pardon me? I said there was a fair possibility of the amount being much more. When we remember $36,000,000 have been coined it is impossible to know how many will come in for redemption.

Mr. CHACE. There is no fair possibility of any such thing.

Mr. BLAND. I do not say it is a probability, but it is a possibility which the House should consider.

Mr. CHACE. The House can consider anything. It might consider the danger of meteoric stones if it pleases; but that is not among the possibilities.

Whatever the amount may be, it is evident from the tone of the remarks on both sides of this question that it is a subject which demands the consideration of the House. It is evident further from the objections which have been made that we can not have it considered at this present time. Certainly until the 11th of next month is ample time for gentlemen to examine this question carefully and make up their minds; and for my part I can see no objection to fixing that day. I do not propose to enter into the merits of the bill. It will be time enough to do that when we get it before the House for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. DOWD. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. MCMILLIN. The question before the House is not what ought to be passed to-day or what can be passed to-day. The question is, will the House fix a day for the consideration of the bill referred to in the resolution? The members of the committee, the members of this House, under the rules can not change that resolution if they would. It is not under this call subject to amendment. Hence members are to determine whether or not they are to give a day for the consideration of this question.

Whether for or against the bill that has been reported, whether favoring the majority or favoring the minority report, there is one point upon which all will agree: that this is a matter of sufficient importance to justify us in giving it consideration. There never yet has been and there never will be a time when the question involved in this bill can be of more importance to the American people. From day to day the currency is being contracted. Month after month the work of its contraction goes on.

But it behooves us to cast about and devise every judicious means for the purpose of supplying the place of the currency which is being exhausted. Will we do it? The Government made this a dollar, and I do not sympathize with the proposition to treat it otherwise than as a dollar. But by some power, by some influence, actuated by some motive, it has lost caste with the American people, and the question is whether we who find it discredited to-day will make it what it was and what it was intended to be. For one I am ready to do it.

I do not believe that we can get at it any earlier than the 11th day of next month. I think it is a question which we ought to consider calmly and dispassionately. It is a question which can not receive that careful consideration it is entitled to receive in the fifteen minutes upon each side given by the rules upon a motion to suspend the rules.

While I may not agree with a majority of the committee in their report, and do not think I do, still I think we ought to set a day for the consideration of the question, and I hope the House will do it. There have been efforts made to put down the silver dollar. But those efforts have failed, ought to fail, and always will fail while the people are behind that currency. They are efforts which come from the East, which come from the other end of this avenue; but they come from a quarter which is not potent to destroy silver as a currency.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOWD. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think there is no question but that the whole country demands that the trade-dollar piece be taken out of circulation. It is a coin by means of which speculators have been able to play fast and loose with the people; at one time paying it out at its par value, claiming that as it contains seven and a half more grains of silver than the standard dollar it ought to be worth at least as much, then again crying it down and buying it in at 80 or 85 cents on the dollar. If this Congress shall adjourn without taking this coin out of circulation that operation will be continued.

While that is true, I think there is no way to take the trade dollar out of circulation except by making it changeable for standard dollars at par, or receivable for public dues, as this bill proposes. I can see no way by which this coin can be called in at less than par, even if the Government could afford to repudiate any part of it, which I think it can not afford to do.

As we all know, the trade-dollar was a legal-tender coin when issued, and it remains a lawful coin of the United States. It was undoubtedly a blunder to issue it in the first place. It was issued under the mistaken idea that if silver was coined in large pieces we would get more per ounce for it abroad. There never was anything in that idea.

I think that this is a good bill, and I would be willing to vote for its passage now, although I would like to vote to strike out the fourth section of the bill; but being satisfied that the majority of this House will vote to retain that section, and retention of it I should not deem a sufficient reason for voting against the bill, and believing that the sooner the bill is passed the better, I am ready to vote for it at once.

And, with the permission of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOWD] who has charge of the bill, I ask unanimous consent of the House to change the date fixed for the consideration of the bill from March 11 to February 27.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] asks unanimous consent to strike out of the resolution "March 11" and insert in lieu thereof "February 27." Is there objection?

Mr. BRUMM. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EMENTROUT] has two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I regret very much that the rules of this House are so framed as not to allow the amendment proposed, and that the temper of two or three members upon the floor is such as not to allow the immediate disposition of this matter.

I rise, however, only to say that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], the author of the "Bland dollar" so called, ought to be in favor of the passage of this bill, for the result would be to put into circulation more of his dollars instead of the trade-dollars, which are in the pockets not of repudiating banks and jobbers, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has said, but of the people. For the banks in my neighborhood and the people took them at par. Not over 5 per cent., I am credibly informed, of the millions have been taken under par. But suppose some have, shall it be said that because some long-headed jobbers will profit the innocent shall suffer loss? The longer you delay action the more rope you give to the jobbers.

The people accepted them from the Government as whole dollars in good faith, and the Government is bound to keep that faith.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] says it will cost the Government $300,000 out of every two millions that are coined if this bill shall pass. I do not care if the Government does lose $300,000 out of every two million, provided the trade-dollars which are now in the pockets of the people are made whole. But that is a mistake, because so high an authority as the Secretary of the Treasury and others of equal authority declare that the cost of the manipulation of these trade-dollars into standard dollars would be made up by the difference in the value of the coins.

As to the declaration of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] that such a bill as this can never pass the House, I wish he would allow it to have a trial of strength to-day.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The time for debate under the rule has expired. The question is now upon the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which has been read. That requires a two-thirds vote.

The question was taken by a viva voce vote; and the Speaker announced that there appeared to be two-thirds voting in the affirmative

Mr. WELLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

Many MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. WELLER. I will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays and demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 144, nays 6.

Mr. WELLER. I would like to remark that I am opposed to the Republican trade-dollar swindle from the day of its inception for all time.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] is not in order; the time for debate upon this resolution has been exhausted.

So (no further count being called for) the rules were suspended and the resolution adopted (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

DISTRICT OF GLOUCESTER.

Mr. LONG. I am authorized by the Committee on Commerce to move a suspension of the rules to take from the House Calendar and put upon its passage the bill (H. R. 3956) to amend section 2527 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the district of Gloucester. This bill has been unanimously reported by the committee.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the second clause of section 2527 of the Revised Statutes, describing the district of Gloucester, is hereby amended by making the town of Rockport a port of delivery therein.

The question being taken, the motion of Mr. LONG to suspend the rules and pass the bill was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

COMMITTEE SITTINGS DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know whether it is in order now, but I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to ask that the committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that request will be granted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make a similar request on behalf of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, this request will be granted. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOPKINS. The select committee appointed to investigate charges against H. V. Boynton have directed me to make a similar request for that committee

Mr. KEIFER. That ought to be granted.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, this request will be granted. The Chair hears no objection.

RELIEF OF SOLDIERS FROM CHARGE OF DESERTION.

Mr. STEELE. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to move a suspension of the rules so as to take from the Private Calendar and put upon its passage the bill (H. R. 4383) to relieve certain soldiers from the charge of desertion.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the charge of desertion now standing on the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the United States against any soldier who served in the late war in the volunteer service shall be removed in all cases where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, from such rolls and records, or from other satisfactory testimony, that any such soldier served faithfully until the expiration of his term of enlistment, or until the 1st day of May, A. D. 1865, or was prevented from completing his term of service by reason of wounds received or disease contracted in the line of duty, but who, by reason of absence from his command at the time the same was mustered out, failed to be mustered out and to receive an honorable discharge.

SEC. 2. That the charge of desertion standing on the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the United States against any soldier who served in the late war in the volunteer service shall also be removed in all cases where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, from such rolls and records, or from other satisfactory testimony, that such soldier charged with desertion or with absence without leave, and after such charge of desertion or absence without leave, voluntarily returned to his command, and served in the line of his duty until he was mustered out of the service, and received a certificate of honorable discharge.

SEC. 3. That in all cases where the charge of desertion shall be removed under the provisions of this act from the record of any soldier who has not received a certificate of discharge, it shall be the duty of the Adjutant-General of the United States to issue to such soldier, or, in case of his death, to his heirs or legal representatives, a certificate of discharge.

SEC. 4. That when the charge of desertion shall be removed under the provisions of this act from the record of any soldier, such soldier, or, in case of his death, the heirs or legal representatives of such soldier, shall receive all pay and bounty which may have been withheld on account of such charge of desertion or absence without leave: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to give to any such soldier as may be entitled to relief under the provisions of this act, or, in case of his death, to the heirs or legal representatives of any such soldier, the right to receive pay and bounty for any period of time during which such soldier was absent from his command without leave of absence: And provided further, That no soldier, nor the heirs or legal representatives of any soldier, who served in the Army a period of less than six months shall be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded on the motion to suspend the rules? [Cries of "No!" "No!" "Question!"]

Mr. TALBOTT. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment, to be inserted at the end of section 4. If the amendment be read I think there will be no objection to it.

Several MEMBERS. Let it be read.

The SPEAKER. It will be read, if there be no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the provisions of this bill shall apply also to the soldiers of the war of 1812, Black Hawk war, and the war with Mexico.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] asks unanimous consent that this amendment be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Would there not be an inconsistency in the provisions of the bill with this amendment inserted? The bill fixes certain dates——

Mr. TALBOT. There will be no difficulty.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposed amendment? The Chair hears none.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. STEELE to suspend the rules and pass the bill, it was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

POSTAGE ON SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am directed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to move a suspension of the rules in order to take from the House Calendar and pass the bill (H. R. 1323) fixing the rate of postage to be paid upon mail matter of the second class when sent by persons other than the publisher or news agent.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the rate of postage on newspaper and periodical publications of the second class, when sent by others than the publisher or news agent, shall be 1 cent for each three ounces or fractional part thereof, and shall be fully prepaid by postage-stamps affixed to said matter.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded on this motion?

Mr. BINGHAM. Before the Chair puts that proposition I wish to state that I have been directed by the committee to amend the bill by inserting "four" in lieu of "three" in the fifth line, making the rate "1 cent for each four ounces or fractional part thereof."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendment which he has stated. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think there should be a second upon this motion. There ought to be some explanation.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection a second will be considered as ordered. The Chair hears no objection. There will be thirty minutes for debate, fifteen to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] and fifteen by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] who demanded the second.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not know that I desire to control any time. I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill to explain its effect. I would like to know whether it reduces postage on periodicals or on what class of mail matter it does reduce postage.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, this bill comes from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads unanimously reported. There are two classes of what may be called newspaper and periodical mail matters. One, the second class, coming from the publisher or the news agent, goes at the rate of 2 cents a pound. Under the law second-class mail matter embraces all newspapers and other periodical publications which are issued at such intervals and as frequently as four times a year and are within the conditions named in the next succeeding section. That class of matter goes through the mails at 2 cents a pound.

Now, the class of matter to which this bill alludes consists of transient newspapers and periodicals, not from the office of publication or the news agent to the subscriber but from individual to individual. The recent publications of the great journals of our cities when placed on the scales turn them at two and three ounces. The postage for transient mail matter, newspaper and periodical, is to go at the rate of 1 cent for two ounces. There is a popular belief that 1 cent will carry transient newspapers, but the great papers of the country weigh over two ounces, and many of them as much as three ounces and over. Therefore, when going from citizen to citizen, as the law requires full payment, and not, as with letters, one rate carrying, when one stamp only is put on, and the paper weighs over two ounces, I say instead of going to the party, as in the case of letters, it goes into what is called dead matter and is sold for waste paper.

There is no criticism on the part of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, except to indorse the recommendation of the Postmaster-General. I would ask to have the report read, but it is so comprehensive it cannot be read in the time allotted to this debate.

Several MEMBERS. Print it with your remarks.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will do that with the consent of the House.

The report is as follows:

Mr. BINGHAM, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 1323:

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill fixing the rate to be paid upon mail matter of the second class thereof when sent by persons other than the publisher or news agent, beg leave to submit the following report:

The committee would respectfully state that Hon. Walter Q. Gresham, Postmaster-General, in his annual report, dated Washington, D. C., November 19, 1883, submits, on page 29, the following:

"The postage on third-class matter, embracing newspapers and periodicals sent by others than the publishers, is 1 cent per two ounces. Some of the larger newspapers weigh more than two ounces. There seems to be a popular impression that 1 cent per copy is the uniform rate for all newspapers.

"Many persons, under this impression, deposit in post-offices newspapers which weigh more than two ounces and not exceeding three ounces bearing a 1-cent stamp. Such papers are not entitled to be sent, and perhaps as a rule are not sent. This creates dissatisfaction and complaint. In order to obviate this I recommend that the rate of postage on newspapers and periodical publications sent by others than the publishers or news agents be made 1 cent per three ounces."

In order to fully understand the proposed reduction the early legislation upon newspaper rates is herewith submitted:

Act of February 20, 1792, section 21:

"All newspapers conveyed by mail for any distance not more than 100 miles, 1 cent; and over 100 miles, 1½ cents."

Act of March 2, 1799, section 20, fixes—

"Postage on newspapers at 1 cent each for not more than 100 miles and 1½ cents for any greater distance. Single newspapers from one place to another in same State shall not exceed 1 cent."

Act of April 30, 1810, section 32, re-enacts the act of March 2, 1799.

Act of March 3, 1825, section 30, re-enacts the act of March 2, 1799.

Act of March 3, 1845, section 3:

"Postage on newspapers.—Newspapers of not more than 1,900 square inches in size may be transmitted through the mails by the editors or publishers thereof to subscribers or other persons, within 30 miles of the city, town, or place in which the paper is printed, free of postage. Newspapers of less size, conveyed by mail beyond 30 miles from the place at which they are printed, shall be subject to the rates of postage chargeable under the thirtieth section, act March 3, 1825. Newspapers of greater size than 1,900 square inches subject to same rates of postage as are prescribed by this act on magazines and pamphlets."

Act of March 3, 1845, defines a newspaper:

"Any printed publication issued in numbers, consisting of not more than two sheets and published at short stated intervals of not more than one month, conveying intelligence of passing events, and bona fide extras and supplements of such publications."

Act of March 3, 1847, section 13:

"Newspapers by mail (except exchanges between publishers), except those franked by those enjoying the franking privilege, and newspapers not sent from the office of publication, and handbills or circulars printed or lithographed, not exceeding one sheet, shall be subject to 3 cents prepaid postage each."

Act of March 3, 1851, section 2:

"Newspapers not exceeding 3 ounces in weight, sent from the office of publication to bona fide subscribers, shall be charged with postage as follows:

"Weekly newspapers, free within the county where published, and for not exceeding 50 miles out of the county where published, 5 cents per quarter; exceeding 50 miles and not exceeding 300 miles, 10 cents per quarter; exceeding 300 miles and not exceeding 1,000 miles, 15 cents per quarter; exceeding 1,000 miles and not exceeding 2,000 miles, 20 cents per quarter; exceeding 2,000 miles and not exceeding 4,000 miles, 25 cents per quarter; exceeding 4,000 miles, 30 cents per quarter.

"Newspapers published monthly, sent to bona fide subscribers, one-quarter of the foregoing rates; published semi-monthly, one-half of the foregoing rates; published semi-weekly, double the foregoing rates; published tri-weekly, treble the foregoing rates; and oftener than tri-weekly, five times the foregoing rates; on other papers, unsealed circulars, handbills, engravings, pamphlets, periodicals, magazines, books, and all other printed matter unconnected with written matter, of not more than one ounce in weight and not exceeding 500 miles, 1 cent; and for each additional ounce or fraction thereof, 1 cent; exceeding 500 miles and not exceeding 1,500 miles, double these rates; exceeding 1,500 miles and not exceeding 2,500 miles, treble these rates; exceeding 2,500 miles and not exceeding 3,500 miles, four times these rates; exceeding 3,500 miles, five times these rates."

The act of March 3, 1851, seems to have been the most complicated of all legislation covering this subject.

The act of August 30, 1852, section 1, enacts a law clear and simple:

"From and after September 30, 1852, postage on all printed matter passing by mail, instead of the rates now charged, shall be as follows: Each newspaper, periodical, unsealed circular, or other article of printed matter, not exceeding three ounces in weight, to any part of the United States, 1 cent, and for every additional ounce or fraction thereof, 1 cent additional.

"Postage on any newspaper or periodical paid quarterly or yearly in advance at the office of delivery or at the office of mailing, one-half of said rates only shall be charged.

"Newspapers and periodicals not weighing over one and one-half ounces, when circulated in the State where published, one-half the rates before mentioned.

"Small newspapers and periodicals published monthly or oftener, and pamphlets of not more than sixteen octavo pages, sent in single packages weighing at least eight ounces to one address, and prepaid by postage-stamps affixed, only, one-half cent for each ounce or fraction of an ounce.

"Postage on all transient matter shall be prepaid, or charged double the rates first mentioned."

The legislation proposed by the bill under consideration fixes the same rate as the act of August 30, 1852, so far as the first three ounces in weight of newspaper or periodical publications are concerned.

Act of June 8, 1872, section 163:

"Postage on mailable matter of the third class shall be at the rate of 1 cent for each two ounces or fraction thereof, except that double these rates shall be charged for books, samples of metals, ores, minerals, and merchandise."

Act of June 3, 1874, section 5:

"On and after January 1, 1875, all newspapers and periodical publications mailed from a known office of publication or news agency, and addressed to regular subscribers or news agents, postage shall be charged at the following rates: On newspapers and periodical publications issued weekly or more frequently, 2 cents a pound or fraction thereof, and on those issued less frequently than once a week, 3 cents a pound or fraction thereof: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be held to change section 99 of the act of June 8, 1872."

Act of March 3, 1879:

"Mail matter of the third class shall embrace books, transient newspapers, and periodicals, * * * and postage shall be paid at the rate of 1 cent for each two ounces or fractional part thereof, and shall be fully prepaid by postage-stamps affixed to said matter."

The act of 1879 is the law under which newspapers and periodicals, when sent by other than the publisher or news agent, are charged 1 cent for each two ounces or fractional part thereof.

The rates of postage of other nations on newspapers and periodicals would seem to encourage rather than repel the transmission of this class of matter, in view of the very fair and reasonable rates of postage charged. We submit the conditions of payment, the rates charged, and weight, together with penalty for non-payment of rates, in some eighteen countries:

Countries.	Condition of payment.	Prepaid rates.		When partially prepaid.
		Cents.	Ounce.
Austria-Hungary	Compulsory	⅖	1⅘	Double the deficiency.
Argentine Republic	....do	2	8½	Unmailable.
Belgium	Optional	⅖	1⅘	Double the deficiency.
Brazil	Compulsory	⅖	1⅘	Unmailable.
Canada	....do	1	4	Do.
Denmark	Optional	1/10	Per No.
Egypt	....do	⅕	1⅘	Double the deficiency.
France	Compulsory	⅖	Per copy, size specified.	3 times the deficiency.
Germany	....do	⅖	1⅘	Double the deficiency.
Great Britain	Optional	1	Per copy.	Do.
Greece	Compulsory	⅖	1	Unmailable.
Italy		⅖	1⅘
Netherlands	Compulsory	⅕	Per copy weighing less than ⅝ oz.	3 times the deficiency.
Norway	....do	2	3½	Unmailable.
Russia	....do	1	1⅘	Do.
Spain	....do	⅕	Per No.	Do.
Sweden	....do	⅖	1⅘	Double the deficiency.
Switzerland	....do	⅖	1⅘	Unmailable.
United States	....do	1	2	Do.

Our rates upon this class of matter are higher with one exception than in any of the eighteen nations whose postage your committee has been able to ascertain.

A newspaper can be sent from the United States to any foreign country in the Universal Postal Union, weighing over two ounces or less than four ounces, for the same rate of postage that is charged for its transmission to any part of the United States.

The rate of postage on newspapers from office of publication to subscribers is but 2 cents per pound.

The daily papers now published in all the great centers and cities of the country turn the scale on two ounces and require double postage, or 2 cents, when mailed transient. In brief, the publisher, mailing his publication to the subscriber, pays 2 cents a pound; the same paper, if mailed transient, is charged 2 cents for a single copy. Every seven-column double paper weighs fresh from the press a trifle more than 2 ounces.

It should be remembered that full payment is compulsory on newspapers and periodicals. If the paper weighs over two ounces and but 1 cent postage has been paid, the postmaster is forbidden to forward the same through the mails. Not so with a letter; one rate secures its transmission, and the deficiency is collected from the party to whom the letter is addressed. There is a popular impression that a 1-cent stamp will carry one newspaper; and in every large office hundreds of transient papers become dead because the law requires full postage. So large is this amount of matter that the Post-Office Department has adopted the course of writing to the party addressed that upon sending to the postmaster a 1-cent stamp the paper held for postage will be duly mailed. This requires great clerical labor and some expense to the Department. The Postmaster-General, in his last report, thus refers to the treatment of "held-for-postage matter:"

"The new mode of treating held-for-postage matter, by which the addressees are invited by postmasters to remit the postage and receive the matter directed from the mailing office, and thus prevent it from going to the dead-letter office, was found to work so satisfactorily at the free-delivery offices that an order was issued on May 19, 1883, extending it to all the Presidential offices, to take effect on July 1, 1883. The plan is operating with equally good results at the additional offices to which it was extended by the order."

Your committee are of the opinion that the change in the rate of postage on newspapers and periodicals, when sent by others than the publisher or news agent, to 1 cent for each three ounces or fractional part thereof, in lieu of 1 cent for two ounces, will to no appreciable extent reduce the revenues of the Department, and would certainly be a great convenience and benefit to the people, and would carry through the mails almost every daily or weekly newspaper now published in the country.

The bill is reported with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BINGHAM. In this connection permit me to say, Mr. Speaker, that so vast is the amount of matter which fell dead at post-offices because of being insufficiently stamped that postmasters have communicated by official letter with parties, informing them that by sending a penny or two, or the requisite sum, the matter would be transmitted through the mails.

This measure has been asked for by all the press associations of the country. It simply does this: If you subscribe for a newspaper or periodical the publisher or news agent pays 2 cents a pound for postage. If I send you a paper, Mr. Speaker, the postage is 1 cent for two ounces, and if it exceeds two ounces and has only one stamp on it it is dead matter and does not go through the mails. This is to provide for sending to parties to whom papers and periodicals are addressed, although the postage may not be fully paid. It is just and right, and should pass.

Further, I would state that this will make no appreciable difference in the income of the Department. It will simply send to the party addressed the paper that the individual desires him to receive.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not care to occupy the time of the House after listening to the explanation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I am satisfied from his statement that the bill ought to pass.

I will take occasion simply to say that if we could know beforehand what bills are to be presented to the House on such days as this, then we might be prepared to vote without the explanation that otherwise seems to be necessary. I yield the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND].

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I take the floor simply for the purpose of saying that I concur fully with the statement and opinion expressed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, on this bill. This proposition to fix a limit to transient newspaper postage of 1 cent for four ounces was introduced by myself early in the session. I shall therefore sustain the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the bill passed, including the amendment which has been read?

The bill was passed as amended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

STEEL GUNBOAT.

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Maryland advises the Chair that he was not prepared when his committee was called to present this resolution.

Mr. TALBOTT. No, sir; I was looking for the resolution in my desk when another committee was called.

The SPEAKER. Under the circumstances the Chair will again call the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. TALBOTT. The resolution which I send to the desk is offered by instructions from that committee.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I object to going back, Mr. Speaker. The Committee on Naval Affairs has been already passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland advises the Chair that he was preparing to present the resolution, was getting it out of his desk, when the Chair passed to another committee. Under the circumstances the Chair thinks no advantage should be taken of the omission.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Under the circumstances, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That House bill 5044, entitled a bill to authorize the construction of a steel gunboat, be made the special order for Thursday, the 28th instant, and so on from day to day until the same shall be disposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a second.

Mr. TALBOTT. Let a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. COX, of New York. This needs an explanation, and we should have a second.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent has been asked that a second be ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and a second was declared ordered.

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Speaker, has the bill been reported?

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House.

Mr. TALBOTT. Then I will simply state that this is a bill authorized by the Committee on Naval Affairs to be reported to the House on last Friday, with instructions from the committee to use my best endeavors in any manner to secure the prompt consideration of the bill. It is a bill providing for the construction of a steel gunboat, somewhat upon the model of the one which is already built and now in the service, the Alarm. This is a vessel the plans for which have been matured by the Admiral of the Navy, Admiral Porter, assisted by some of the best engineering skill and talent and by the advice of the best naval architects in the service.

It is not necessary for me to state to this House the importance of constructing a navy. I desire to say in my brief time that that is an admitted fact upon all hands. The Secretary of the Navy says that as a means of defensive warfare this vessel would undoubtedly be a success. The provisions of this bill are so guarded as to make it acceptable to the most critical mind in the House. I only say that for the satisfaction of the House, as I do not now desire to enter upon its merits. It provides simply that this vessel shall be constructed in the navy-yards under the supervision and advice of the Admiral of the Navy himself. It is wise that this Congress should so proceed, because I have no doubt from all the information I can gather that the best character of work, so far as the construction of vessels of this kind is concerned—engines, machinery, and boilers—can be had at the Government navy-yards.

All I ask now, however, is that this bill be set for consideration, for debate, in this House at the time fixed in the resolution.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Has the bill been printed?

Mr. TALBOTT. I will state in addition that the Admiral of the Navy, Admiral Porter, appeared before the committee and advocated himself the construction of this vessel.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I ask, has the bill been printed?

Mr. TALBOTT. It was introduced and recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs on last Friday.

I yield now five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey and five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Speaker, I was not present in the Naval Committee when the discussion took place with reference to this bill. I was necessarily absent during both of the meetings of the committee and absent at the time that Admiral Porter appeared before it. I do not know what arguments were used by him in advocating its passage. I am informed that the Naval Committee of this House were unanimous in asking the passage of this resolution.

I consider this measure a very important one. I think it takes a middle ground between the opinions of the professional alarmists on one hand, who are asking a very large Navy, and those on the other hand who are opposed to any. It asks that our coast defenses shall be put in order in the manner which has been suggested by the gentleman from Maryland, by the construction of such vessels as the Alarm and that which is proposed in this bill. Such vessels and proper coast fortifications may be a solution of many naval questions.

I find from what I heard him say that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs is very much opposed to the consideration of the bill because the committee acted in his absence. So far as that is concerned I may say that the committee also acted in my absence, although it is true that I am not chairman, but merely a member of the same. I think, however, notwithstanding the opposition of the chairman of the Naval Committee to the bill, the House should fix a day for considering it. I think the passage of this and similar bills looking to the proper defense of our coast would satisfy the people of this country. We are not asking for an enormous and expensive navy. We do not think it good policy that we should enter into active and immediate competition and hurry off a navy to vie with that of the great naval powers of the world. The people of this land may be in favor of a fair navy to keep together its admirable corps of officers and men, but it is unfortunately true that the Navy Department has not had the confidence of the people of this country. There is possibly a demand for a reasonable and competent navy here, but unfortunately the people have not been willing from sad experiences to trust implicitly the men who have had the expenditure of the money in building up such a fleet. I think this bill is a very fair, wise, and good measure, and I hope the House will give it the consideration it merits.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Does the gentleman from New Jersey wonder from what has taken place in the past few years that the country has not confidence in the expenditures for a navy?

Mr. MCADOO. The gentleman from Ohio intimates that I am inconsistent in asking that money shall be given to a Department in which the country has not confidence.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Oh, no; that was not what I said.

Mr. MCADOO. If the gentleman will examine this bill he will find this boat is not to be built under the Navy Department, but under the personal supervision of the Admiral of the Navy. It is to be built under his personal supervision at one of the regular navy-yards of the Government. I am willing to have it so built for one.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman misunderstood my interpellation.

Mr. TALBOTT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS. The passage of this bill, Mr. Speaker, was recommended by the unanimous voice of the Committee on Naval Affairs, so far as the members were present. It was recommended on two considerations: first, that this country is very much in need of such a gunboat as this bill contemplates; and, secondly, because the Admiral of the Navy came before our committee and explained fully the size and efficiency of the boat, if built according to the plans submitted by him to the committee.

I do not agree with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McADOO], a member of the committee, who has stated that the country had not confidence in the Navy Department. If there was such an expression as that made either before or by the committee I did not hear it and I do not indorse the statement. On the contrary, sir, I believe that the people of this country not only indorse the Navy Department, but desire and demand of Congress that we shall build a navy which will be able to protect the honor and the interests of this country on every sea. We are in a shameful, criminal, and helpless condition to-day, so far as a navy is concerned. Any of the great ports of this country might be laid under contribution by any one of the vessels belonging to the navies of England, of France, of Germany, of Spain, or even of Chili. With the modern ordnance now employed on shipboard by foreign nations, a vessel might anchor two miles off Coney Island and shell Brooklyn with perfect impunity. And no vessel or gun owned by either the Army or Navy of the United States could have the slightest effect upon the ironclads that are now floating in the other navies of the world.

I say it is simply criminal for us to stand here as we do to-day under the claim of economy, the miserable demagogical cry which the people do not indorse, and allow this country of ours to remain in its present helpless condition. We have the finest corps of naval officers the world has ever seen, educated, accomplished, gallant, ready to do service wherever they may be called, and capable of discharging the highest and most brilliant duties as naval officers. And yet they are bound hand and foot, and Congress goes on day after day, year after year, quibbling about rank and pay and such trifling, miserable questions as those, while the country stands pleading and demanding that we do something to protect it in case of emergency. A letter from the Admiral of the Navy which I hold in my hand shows not only the plan but the absolute necessity of building this vessel. We have but one gunboat, the Alarm, and it is one of the best gunboats of her class in the world. The one proposed by this bill is substantially the same as the Alarm. It will have a speed of seventeen knots an hour, will be armed with two heavy, high-power, breech-loading guns, and will be capable of meeting the strongest antagonist that can be sent us across the water. It is to cost but $250,000; and I hope gentlemen will not hesitate one moment to authorize the building of this vessel. All along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts are points of danger which might be invaded any day. I am tired of seeing this country pocket insult after insult simply because economy, so called, says we shall not vote money to build a navy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland has two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. TALBOTT. I reserve my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is entitled to fifteen minutes in opposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the House will not consider this subject of increasing the Navy by piecemeal. The subject necessarily belongs to the Committee on Appropriations. The House has now before it the bill reported from that committee making appropriations for the naval service for the coming fiscal year, and necessarily the sum of money recommended to be expended for the enlargement of the Navy is embodied in that bill.

The naval appropriation bill proposes to appropriate for the completion of the three new steel cruisers, the Chicago, the Boston, and the Atlanta, and the dispatch-boat Dolphin, the sum in all of $921,500. It proposes to appropriate for the completion of the steam machinery of the three cruisers named and the dispatch-boat the sum of $620,000. It proposes to appropriate for completing the equipment and outfit of the cruisers and dispatch-boat $78,600, and for completing the Mohican, one of the monitors on the Pacific coast, $50,000.

Now, these four items of appropriation for the enlargement of the Navy, embracing the three steel cruisers, the Dolphin, and the monitor Mohican on the Pacific coast, are what is recommended by the Committee on Appropriations for that purpose. The naval appropriation bill was made a special order for to-morrow, I believe, or at least the gentleman having charge of it notified the House that he would call it up for consideration on that day.

The bill was reported by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS], a member on the subcommittee of that committee having charge of the bill, will necessarily be absent to-morrow, and at his instance, by the action of the Committee on Appropriations, the bill was postponed until a later day.

The House, therefore, will understand that the subject of the enlargement of the Navy has already been fully considered by one of the committees of the House; that the plan, the extent of the enlargement, has already been reported to the House by that committee. All I ask of the House is simply that they will not consider so important a subject by piecemeal. When the naval appropriation bill is reached, as it will be in the course of a few days, if it shall be deemed proper to increase the appropriation by putting on this additional vessel, well and good; but do not let us divide the subject and consider it by piecemeal, but consider it as it should be considered, in one bill.

I will yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], if he desires it.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am under some embarrassment in speaking upon this subject, as coming into this House from my home I find this bill pending.

In one sense I am astounded, because there was appointed a subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs to consider this whole matter of building ships, and we were to advise with the Committee on Appropriations, which had already considered the subject to some extent.

As some gentlemen say, I did invite Admiral Porter to come to our committee on Thursday. He came and spoke and advised about this steamer. By the New York papers I found that already on Thursday the committee had passed this matter. I telegraphed them asking them as a personal favor that on Friday the motion to reconsider should be entered, because I wanted a fair consideration of this whole business; I did not want any "snapperadoes" of practice.

The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs is not of much consequence personally; he may not believe as the rest of the committee do. But at least there is some responsibility resting on that committee when a large sum of money is proposed to be expended. I lay down this proposition for members who consider their duty properly in this House, that where a system is so thoroughly mangled and tangled and wrangled as this naval business is in our country to-day, there ought to be some consideration given when it is proposed to organize a new and perhaps a better system.

I am ready to do all I can physically and otherwise to renew our Navy and to put it into good condition, if it be possible. I would like first to build up our commerce, so that our Navy might have something to look after. That may not be first done. We may be compelled to build ships for some possibility that may arise; we do not know what the danger may be.

I do trust the House will remit this matter to the Committee on Naval Affairs, so that they may consider the whole subject, not merely one ideal cruiser or steamer in the brain of our admirable Admiral, but to consider the whole matter in the light of the testimony which is now being taken in the Senate, in the light to be drawn from recent inventions and improvements connected with naval architecture. Believing that, although almost alone on the committee in that opinion, I ask that this matter may go by for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has seven minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not know that I care to consume that time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] has two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. TALBOTT. As I have already stated to the House, this measure was adopted by the Committee on Naval Affairs, with nine members present, by a unanimous vote. It was adopted on the suggestion of the Admiral of the Navy. If he is not fit to make a suggestion of that character to the House he ought not to be Admiral of the Navy. But I think he certainly has shown at some time or other in his life his fitness to make suggestions which are entitled to consideration.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] says he telegraphed to the Committee on Naval Affairs to reconsider the matter. So he did, but he did not ask it on personal grounds. I will state to the gentleman that the Committee on Naval Affairs did reconsider the matter in accordance with his request, and then again ordered me to report this resolution to the House and ask—what? That we shall pass the bill? Not that. That we shall have a day in court for the interest of the American Navy; and I ask this House to give it to us.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask the House to send it back to the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. A single word. The whole subject has been considered very thoroughly by a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations and finally by the whole committee. All I ask of the House is that it will not embarrass its own action by considering this matter by piecemeal.

Mr. TALBOTT. I ask the House to give us a day in court. We have no guarantee that the Committee on Appropriations are going to consider this matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is in the House now in the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. COX, of New York. I would inquire of the Chair if the Thursday named in the resolution has not already been fixed for the obsequies of Mr. HASKELL, of Kansas?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can state that such is the fact.

Mr. TALBOTT. This is a continuing order, and the subject will go over until the next day.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 72, noes 83.

So (two-thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

The SPEAKER resumed the call of committees for motions to suspend the rules.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. CASSIDY. I am directed by the Committee on Pacific Railroads to move a suspension of the rules for the adoption of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pacific Railroads have leave on the 12th day of March, 1884, to report or take from the Calendar any bill or bills they have perfected at said time, relating to any of the subjects referred to said committee; and said bill or bills when so reported or taken from the Calendar shall be for present consideration from day to day until completed, not, however, to interfere with revenue or appropriation bills; and if on said day, from any cause, said committee be unable to report or take from the Calendar any of said bills, then upon any day thereafter, not to interfere with revenue and appropriation bills and prior orders of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection a second will be considered as ordered. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. My only object in demanding a second was to inquire of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. CASSIDY] what particular bill his resolution has reference to; and if it has not reference to any particular bill, to what class of bills does it refer?

Mr. CASSIDY. I will state, Mr. Speaker, for the information of the House, that the object of the resolution is to assign a day for the consideration of such business as may be before the Committee on the Pacific Railroads. There are some important questions pending in that committee. In fact, upon two of these subjects measures have been matured by the committee. One of these questions—which is of the greatest importance in the judgment of the committee—relates to the increase of what is known as the Thurman sinking fund. We have also ready to be reported to the House a bill which relates to the enforcement of the claim of the United States against the land-grant railroads for the cost of surveying and listing the lands to the railroad companies. Briefly, these are the important questions pending before the committee. Gentlemen of the House well understand that if these measures are merely reported to the House and allowed to take their places upon the general Calendar it simply means that they will not be reached at all during the session. In view of this fact, I have been directed by the committee to ask the adoption of this resolution, so that the House may assign a day to the committee for the consideration of these bills to which I have alluded.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not having heard distinctly the statement of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. CASSIDY], I wish to inquire whether the bills proposed to be reported, and intended to be covered by this resolution, include the amendment to the funding act touching the Pacific railroad in its various organizations?

Mr. CASSIDY. Precisely; that is one of the bills sought to be covered by the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. Can not the gentleman assure us that that will be one of the earliest bills brought forward in the event of the adoption of this resolution?

Mr. CASSIDY. It will be one of the very first, probably the second bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. What will be the first?

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman say that this bill will be the first reported?

Mr. CASSIDY. I would have no objection to so framing the resolution, although I have no authority to change its phraseology. But the only measures to be reported from that committee are those I have referred to. I yield a moment to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON].

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this committee I wish to say to the House that our experience in the last two or three Congresses has shown that measures pending before our committee are of such a character that legislation can not be perfected without great care and consideration. But when a bill has been brought into the House heretofore it has gone upon the Calendar and has never received consideration at the hands of the House. Now, we ought to have a day to be heard.

I will say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the amendment to the Thurman act is now under consideration by our committee, and will be reported, I have no doubt, in time to be considered under this resolution. We have also another bill perfected which is of equal importance; and we want to consider that also. The resolution is broad enough to cover both bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. If one of the bills to be considered is a measure enlarging the scope of the Thurman act, that, it seems to me, would justify the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is broader than that.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Nevada [Mr. CASSIDY] will allow me to suggest that this resolution is very broad. I do not see but that it will give the committee an opportunity to consider every question before it, and to go on from day to day until they are all considered. Now, I have no objection to any bill the gentleman has mentioned, but I think the House had better consider carefully the terms of the resolution before adopting it.

Mr. CASSIDY. I will say to the gentleman from Maine that the committee has no desire to abuse the privilege which the House may grant. I have stated the subjects which will be covered by the bills reported.

Mr. REED. Let the resolution be again read.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think the gentleman from Maine will find that this resolution gives us but one day to report as many bills as we can consider on that day, and if any bill be pending at the close of the day, to continue the consideration of that bill.

Mr. REED. I think by the resolution the privileges provided for are given to the committee from day to day.

Mr. THOMPSON. If the gentleman will examine the resolution, I think he will find it provides merely that the consideration of any bill taken up on that day and not finished shall be continued.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be again read.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Nevada that the resolution be so amended.

Mr. COBB. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COBB. I desire to inquire whether this resolution, not having mentioned any of the committees but the Committees on Appropriations and Ways and Means, would cut off the Committee on the Public Lands, which committee is by resolution placed next to those two committees. My idea is it would not, but I wish to have the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. CASSIDY. There is a limitation on the resolution. It does not antagonize existing orders of the House.

Mr. COBB. That is, an existing order.

Mr. CASSIDY. Some gentlemen seem to have a misapprehension.

The SPEAKER. The matter referred to by the gentleman from Indiana is a special order of the House.

Mr. CASSIDY. Inasmuch as several gentlemen seem to be laboring under a misapprehension as to the intention of the committee, I ask to amend the resolution by limiting the time assigned to the committee to two days.

Mr. REED. Limit it to a particular bill, so we may know what we are to consider.

Mr. CASSIDY. The difficulty about that is this: There have been half a dozen bills covering the same general subject referred to the committee, and the committee will bring in substitutes.

Mr. REED. The committee does not know what it wishes to do.

Mr. CASSIDY. Yes, we do. We wish to consider the bill about the cost of surveying and the bill about the Thurman sinking fund.

Mr. REED. Why not confine your action to those two bills?

Mr. CASSIDY. We have other matters besides.

Mr. REED. You do not know what you wish to bring in.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is all we want.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yield to me a minute.

Mr. CASSIDY. Certainly.

Mr. THOMPSON. By the consent of the gentleman from Nevada I ask that the resolution be modified.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I withdraw it.

Mr. THOMPSON. By consent of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. CASSIDY], I move the resolution be modified so that it shall be limited to the Thurman sinking fund and to taxing the costs of surveys of lands that railroads are charged with. Let it be limited to those two acts.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is right.

Mr. CONVERSE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. THOMPSON. Oh, no! Vote it down.

Mr. CONVERSE. By request I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on suspending the rules.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask the resolution be read to the House as modified.

Mr. HORR. I object to the modification.

Mr. RYAN. I hope the gentleman will not object to that modification. These bills are of the highest importance and ought to be considered.

Mr. ANDERSON. Would it be in order for the gentleman from Kentucky to move to amend the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules can not be amended.

Mr. THOMPSON. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. KASSON. There is a misapprehension here, Mr. Speaker, touching the form of the last proposition. I understand, and if I am incorrect the Chair will correct me, as proposed to be modified it is limited to two bills which the committee have already prepared, and which they name in the resolution. Am I right?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KASSON. And therefore the resolution is limited to the consideration of these two bills. The gentleman from Michigan withdraws his objection.

Mr. HORR. I shall not object if it is limited to the two bills.

Mr. THOMPSON. Then I suggest that modification, that the words "any of the subjects heretofore referred to said committee" be stricken out and insert "the act known as the Thurman sinking fund and any amendment or bill relating to section 21 of the act of 1864 relating to fees due from Pacific railroads for surveying and patenting lands granted to them."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to be permitted to modify the resolution in the manner he has suggested, so as to make it applicable to the two measures exclusively, one being what is commonly known as the Thurman sinking fund act and the other with reference to the law in relation to the payment by land-grant railroads for the cost of surveys, &c.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, section 21 of the act of 1864.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the resolution was modified accordingly.

Mr. CONVERSE. I now renew my motion that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which has been read.

Mr. KEIFER. As modified.

The SPEAKER. That takes the place of the original resolution.

The resolution was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

Mr. BUCKNER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 95, noes 53.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, and Mr. BUCKNER were appointed tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 92.

Mr. REED. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; 47 members voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 71, nays 144, not voting 106; as follows:

Houk,	Money,	Singleton,

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I move to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I object.

Mr. POLAND. I wish to state that Mr. MILLS, of Texas, was obliged to leave the House in consequence of being unwell. I should vote "ay" if I had not been paired with him and presume he would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT OF PATENT LAWS.

Mr. VANCE (when the Committee on Patents was called). Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Patents to ask the passage of House bill 4377 with an amendment.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I move that this House do now adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. That motion is not now in order.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order at this time, no business having been transacted since the last vote.

The gentleman from North Carolina moves to suspend the rules, under instructions from the Committee on Patents, and pass a bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House bill 4377. A bill to amend section 4887 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I demand a second.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. VANCE. At the suggestion of my committee I withdraw this bill for the present.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I am in hopes the House will vote that down.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The gentleman from North Carolina, on the call of the Committee on Patents—the chairman of that committee presents a bill under instructions of the committee and moves to suspend the rules and put the bill upon its passage. After the bill had been partially read he asks leave to withdraw it. Now, I ask if that can be done if there be any objection?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it can, as no second had been ordered. The Chair thinks after a second is ordered the motion to suspend the rules can not be withdrawn or modified except by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Is it not the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Patents has been instructed by his committee to present the bill?

The SPEAKER. That is a matter between the gentleman himself and his committee. The Chair has no control over that. The gentleman from Ohio on the right [Mr. WARNER] moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, there were—ayes 58, noes 85.

Mr. HISCOCK. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 48.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 56, nays 135, not voting 129; as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

After the second roll-call,

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, said: I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. PARKER (in his seat). I object.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I make the point of order that no gentleman rose in his seat to object.

Mr. PARKER (having risen). I object.

The Clerk proceeded to read the names of members voting.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. WAIT with Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina.

Mr. GUENTHER with Mr. DEUSTER.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, with Mr. RUSSELL.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, with Mr. MCCOID.

Mr. WELLER with Mr. KASSON.

Mr. LYMAN with Mr. HUNT.

Mr. HOUK. I am paired with Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, but if I understand the significance of this vote I was entitled to vote, and I voted "no." My understanding is that the object in voting against adjournment is to fix a day to consider the Mexican pension bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. That is the object.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

EVENING SESSIONS FOR PENSION CASES.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions was called.

Mr. MATSON. I am directed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to move to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That, until the further order of this House, on each Friday the House will take a recess at 5 o'clock until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall be considered.

The SPEAKER. If a second is not demanded the question is on suspending the rules and adopting the resolution.

Mr. BEACH. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BEACH. Would an amendment to that resolution be in order?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. BEACH. I think we should provide also for the consideration of bills in relation to condemned cannon.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. REED. I should like to have the resolution reported again.

Several members objected.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then let us have a second.

Mr. ELLIS. I make the point that the demand for a second is too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the demand for a second is in time if made before the question is taken on adopting the resolution.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Who demanded a second?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I am sorry for it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman from Ohio will be responsible for his own acts.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask unanimous consent that the second be considered as ordered.

Mr. PARKER. I object.

The SPEAKER. A second having been demanded, the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 133.

So (further count not being called for) the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] will control one half the time allowed for debate and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] the other.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I demand a second because I was unable to hear what the resolution was and did not understand its purport.

Mr. COBB. I am surprised the gentleman is so deaf.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] can take his own time and make his own speeches in it instead of interjecting them into mine. While I think it is early to begin night sessions regularly, and that it would be better to have left the question of night sessions to be decided at a somewhat later period, I do not oppose this resolution. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is now being proceeded with.

The rules of the House allow thirty minutes for debate after a second of a proposition to suspend the rules, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] is entitled to the floor for fifteen minutes of that time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. While I think night sessions as early as this are not good policy, if it is the wish of the House to have them I shall not vote against them. I stated that I demanded a second in order that we might understand what we are to vote upon. Propositions are precipitated upon the House without any opportunity to know what they are, and then we are asked to vote upon them. I think in all cases, unless members understand beforehand what they are called upon to vote on, there should be thirty minutes allowed for debate.

I do not wish to occupy the time of the House in discussing this question. But it is now ten minutes past 6 o'clock, and the House has been in session continuously from 12 o'clock. It is time to adjourn; and I therefore move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to upon a division—ayes 29, noes 93.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] is entitled to fifteen minutes in favor of his resolution.

Mr. MATSON. I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the resolution adopted which has been read?

The motion was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof); and the rules were suspended and the resolution adopted.

PENSIONS FOR MEXICAN WAR, ETC.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I am instructed unanimously by the Committee on Pensions to move to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 3962) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war and other wars therein named, and for other purposes, be made the special order in the House, as in Committee of the Whole, on Thursday, the 21st day of February, 1884, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of, not to interfere with general appropriation or revenue bills or reports from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Let the bill be reported.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House, and can not be read except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I then call for a second.

The SPEAKER. A second being called for, the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. BROWNE, and the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. HEWITT, to act as tellers.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Oh, no!

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 123, noes 3.

Several MEMBERS. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER). The point is made that no quorum has voted.

Mr. ELLIS. I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A call of the House having been ordered, the Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

Mr. WELLBORN. Before the call begins, if in order, I would like to ask to be excused from further attendance on account of sickness in my family.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Adams, J. J.	Davis, R. T.	Jordan,	Pryor,
Anderson,	Deuster,	Kasson,	Randall,

The SPEAKER. That motion can not be entertained at present.

Mr. GUENTHER. I ask that my colleague [Mr. DEUSTER] be excused.

Mr. COOK. I came in before the doors were closed.

Mr. RYAN. So did I.

Mr. HANBACK. I came in after my name was called.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen will be marked as present.

Mr. ELLIS. I move the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without the leave of the House.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. ELLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody, under its order, Mr. CABELL and Mr. TULLY.

The SPEAKER. Mr. CABELL, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. CABELL. I have been in attendance to-day on a committee of the Senate. Except during that time I have been in my seat. When I left the Senate I went to my dinner. When I learned the House still remained in session I came back and was stopped at the door.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the gentleman from Virginia be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. TULLY, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. TULLY. I was here all day up to a little after 5 o'clock. [Cries of "Louder!"]

The SPEAKER. This is a matter of business and not of jest.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Members should be seated.

The SPEAKER. Members will resume their seats.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I object to turning these proceedings into a farce.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not permit it, if he can avoid it. The gentleman will proceed with his statement.

Mr. TULLY. I was here, Mr. Speaker, all day in my seat until nearly 5 o'clock, and supposing that the House was about to adjourn I went out for a few minutes to get dinner. Not being familiar with the rules of the House I was not aware that such was not the custom. I came as soon as I was aware that the House was in session and demanded the presence of its absent members.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the gentleman from California be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON. The excuse keeps him here, does it?

The SPEAKER. Of course the gentleman can not absent himself without the leave of the House.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody, in obedience to its order, Mr. SNYDER.

The SPEAKER. Mr. SNYDER, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. SNYDER. My excuse is very similar to that which has just been made by the gentleman from California. I was here until about 6 o'clock, and did not anticipate a call of the House. I thought it would adjourn with the last call of the yeas and nays, which was progressing at the time I left. I went to my dinner, and came here as soon as I was notified by the officer that the House was still in session.

Mr. GIBSON. I can certify that he is usually very attentive, and I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody, in obedience to its order, Mr. CANDLER.

The SPEAKER. Mr. CANDLER, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. CANDLER. I left here at ten minutes to 5 o'clock, being very unwell, went to my home, and supposed that the House would adjourn at the usual time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move that my colleague be excused.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I know that he has not been well.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HANBACK. I desire, Mr. Speaker, if it be in order at this time, to enter an excuse for two of my colleagues, Mr. PETERS and Mr. MORRILL. Mr. PETERS went home sick, and has been sick all day. I know he is too unwell to be here. I also ask that Mr. MORRILL be excused because of the fact that his wife is absent and his little children are at home in charge of an invalid daughter. I think it would be difficult for him to leave them at night. For that reason I move that both gentlemen be excused from attendance to-night.

The SPEAKER. It is somewhat irregular to ask that members be excused at this stage of the proceedings. It can be done, however, by unanimous consent.

The gentleman from Kansas asks that his colleague Mr. PETERS be excused on account of sickness.

Mr. COBB. What is the reason for asking this?

Mr. HANBACK. As I have stated, Mr. PETERS is not at all well.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, Mr. PETERS will be excused.

There was no objection.

Mr. HANBACK. I now make the same request in behalf of Mr. MORRILL. As I have said, his family are here, but his wife is absent. He has several children that he could not very well leave at night, especially in view of the fact that his daughter is an invalid.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to excusing Mr. MORRILL on the statement of his colleague?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleague Mr. MILLS be excused on account of sickness. He left here this morning stating that he was going home to take medicine, and I forgot to make the announcement at the time the roll was called.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I shall not object in this case; but we ought to have some medical certificates or else we shall never succeed in getting a quorum.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to excusing Mr. MILLS?

There was no objection.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody, in obedience to its order, Mr. POLAND.

The SPEAKER. Mr. POLAND, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, at about 5 o'clock this afternoon Mr. MILLS, of Texas, informed me that he was ill and desired to leave the House, and asked if I would pair with him for to-day, which I consented to do. I intended then to leave myself, but I remembered that Mr. MILLS said he did not like to have it appear that there was a roll-call and that he was absent. People in my country are not so particular on that subject. But to accommodate Mr. MILLS I remained until there was one roll-call and announced the pair with him; and inasmuch as there seemed to be no use in my remaining, as I had precluded myself from voting, and more than that, Mr. Speaker, supposing the good appetites and good sense of this House would soon produce an adjournment, I left to get my dinner.

Mr. COOK. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes none.

So the motion was agreed to.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody, in obedience to its order Mr. TALBOTT.

The SPEAKER. Mr. TALBOTT, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. TALBOTT. I was paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HARMER] and remained here until 5 o'clock, and went down to my house, believing that there would soon be an adjournment. After getting dinner I came out, and found that the House was still in session, and came up and delivered myself at the door. I therefore ask to be excused.

Mr. McCOMAS. I move that my colleague be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in his custody Mr. BLANCHARD, of Louisiana.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BLANCHARD, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I left the House this evening at 5 o'clock, which is the hour at which the House has adjourned almost every day during the present session. When I left I had no intimation from any quarter whatever that it was likely the House would remain in session after that hour. I did not know until a few minutes ago that it was still in session. As soon as I heard it I at once took a cab and came here. Further than this I have nothing to offer in extenuation of my absence, and I await the pleasure of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Did the gentleman know the Mexican veteran bill was up?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I did not know that bill was up nor did I know it was likely to come up. Had I known it, and had there been a necessity for it, I should have been willing to remain here a week to pass that bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman ought to be excused on that ground.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 56, noes none.

Mr. HARDEMAN. My colleague Mr. CANDLER went home on account of sickness and came back to the House. He is too unwell to remain here. I ask that he be excused.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDEMAN] states that his colleague Mr. CANDLER is too unwell to remain in the House, and asks that he be excused. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The gentleman is excused from attendance this evening.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in his custody Mr. MCKINLEY, of Ohio.

The SPEAKER. Mr. MCKINLEY, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. MCKINLEY. I left the House at 5 o'clock, feeling quite sick. I learned about a half-hour ago that the House was in session. As soon as I learned that there was a call of the House I came up. I ask that I may be excused for this evening on account of indisposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio states he is indisposed and left the Hall on that account.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I move that the gentleman be excused for this evening.

The SPEAKER. The House has heard the excuse of the gentleman from Ohio for non-attendance. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] moves that he be also excused from further attendance this evening. Unless a division is requested the Chair will put both motions together.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I call for a division of the question, unless there is a reason given why the gentleman should be excused from further attendance.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has stated that he is suffering from indisposition. The first question is upon excusing him for absence from the House.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 77, noes 2.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio be excused from further attendance this evening.

Mr. REAGAN. Has the gentleman made that request for himself?

The SPEAKER. He has. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in custody Mr. MCCOID, of Iowa, and Mr. COX, of North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. Mr. MCCOID, you have been absent from the sessions of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. MCCOID. Mr. Speaker, I paired and went to dinner, not understanding that there was to be a night session. I did not intend to be absent without leave of the House.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I move that my colleague be excused.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 58, noes 10.

The SPEAKER. Mr. COX, of North Carolina, you have been absent from the sessions of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I am very much in favor of this bill. I think it ought to pass. In going away I paired, and thereby gave an additional vote in favor of the bill. I did not intend any disrespect to the House, and I considered that I assisted the bill by pairing.

Mr. KING. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 60, noes none.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Pensions that there is a probability that the other side will consent to unanimously fix a day on which this bill may be considered. I wish to know if that will be satisfactory to him.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. What day do they propose?

Mr. GIBSON. The day, I understand, that is fixed in the resolution.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would be perfectly willing, of course, to agree to that, but I will not accept the proposition if it is intended to confine the assignment to one day.

Mr. GIBSON. The suggestion was made to me that those who have been opposing the resolution would probably now give their consent.

Mr. ELLIS. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether this is in order during the proceedings under the call of the House.

The SPEAKER. It is not strictly in order.

Mr. ELLIS. Then I object to it.

Mr. GIBSON. I simply desired to make a suggestion.

Mr. ELLIS. The gentleman has simply obstructed the proceedings of the House under the call. If any of the gentlemen who are filibustering desire to make a proposition in the direction of a compromise we will listen to it.

The SPEAKER. There is no proposition before the House.

Mr. NELSON. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question being taken on Mr. NELSON'S motion, the SPEAKER stated that in the opinion of the Chair the "noes" had it.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I call for a division.

The house divided; and there were—ayes 18, noes 81.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. COSGROVE. I ask unanimous consent that Mr. SKINNER, of New York, be excused from further attendance to-night on account of the sickness of his child.

There was no objection.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody Mr. KLEINER, of Indiana, and Mr. BREITUNG, of Michigan.

The SPEAKER. Mr. KLEINER, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. KLEINER. I represent a district that has within its borders or alongside of it two hundred and fifty miles of overflowed country on the Ohio River. At half past 3 o'clock this afternoon I received a telegram from Hon. Heber J. May, one of my constituents, stating that in Perry County there were 4,000 people without shelter and without food. In response to this appeal for help I proceeded at once to the War Department to consult with Mr. Lincoln as to the quickest way of rendering immediate aid. When I had got through it was half past 5 o'clock and I supposed the House had adjourned for the day, and therefore went to my home direct from the War Department.

Mr. LAMB. I move that my colleague be excused.

The motion to excuse Mr. KLEINER was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BREITUNG, you also have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BREITUNG. Mr. Speaker, before I left this afternoon I heard the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] make a motion to adjourn. I was in my seat when he made the motion. It was carried, as I thought, almost unanimously, and I left my seat, got my overcoat and hat, and left, thinking the House had adjourned. When I was at the hotel I was told there was a call for the House, and I came up here.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to, upon a division—ayes 56, noes 11.

After some further time had elapsed the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody Mr. COX, of New York.

The SPEAKER. Mr. COX, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. COX, of New York. With all respect to the Chair, I beg leave to say that I did not come here under arrest. I came here from a sense of duty. [Cries of "Oh!" "Oh!" and laughter.] I came here in a great fog. I had not the remotest idea that the American Congress was conducting itself so—handsomely. I like to be present on all such occasions. When I left the House, Mr. Speaker, there was a vote being taken on a motion to adjourn by yeas and nays.

A MEMBER. That is too old.

Another MEMBER. That is worn out.

Mr. COX, of New York. I had not the remotest idea when I left but what the yeas had carried the motion to adjourn.

Mr. VAN EATON. I move the gentleman be excused on presenting each member of this House with a copy of "Why we Laugh." [Laughter.]

Mr. COX, of New York. As soon as I get out a cheap edition. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I move that my colleague be excused.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 63, noes 4.

Several MEMBERS. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. It does not require a quorum to excuse a member for non-attendance.

So (no further count being called for) the motion to excuse was agreed to.

After some further time the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody Mr. BROADHEAD, Mr. BUCKNER, and Mr. MONEY.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BROADHEAD, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BROADHEAD. Well, Mr. Speaker, to tell the truth I understood that a motion was going to be made to adjourn.

Several MEMBERS. We have had that too often.

Mr. BROADHEAD. And since I have been a member of this House I have never known that motion to fail.

Mr. KING. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to, upon a division—ayes 64, noes 7.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BUCKNER, you also have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BUCKNER. It was about adjourning time when I left; at least I was hungry. I thought the House was going to adjourn. I left after my name had been called, about a quarter after five o'clock.

A MEMBER. How did you vote?

Mr. BUCKNER. I am asked how I voted. I voted in favor of the adjournment.

Mr. VANCE. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to, upon a division—ayes 40, noes 8.

The SPEAKER. Mr. MONEY, you also have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. MONEY. I left the House about 3 o'clock because I was very sick and I am sick yet. I declined to come up here on the first summons because I was sick. I came on the second because I heard what was up. I came up here to vote for the Mexican veterans. That is all the excuse I have to offer.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MONEY. Believing that my presence here is not necessary now, I would like to be excused from attendance for the remainder of to-night's session.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be excused from further attendance to-night.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly.

The Sergeant at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in his custody Mr. SEYMOUR.

The SPEAKER. Mr. SEYMOUR, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. SEYMOUR. I do not know that I have any sufficient excuse. I have been suffering from a severe cold for the last week, and about half past 5 o'clock, supposing that the House was about to adjourn, I went home.

Mr. MILLARD. I move that the gentleman be excused.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for tellers on that motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. BEACH were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 125, noes not counted.

So the motion to excuse Mr. SEYMOUR was agreed to.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to ask the gentleman who is in charge of this bill whether he will not be content to let the bill be voted upon, striking out all after the word "Mexico," in line 11, so that the bill will apply only to soldiers of the Mexican war.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. No, sir.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will say to the gentleman that if he is willing to amend the bill in that respect—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House except the proceedings to compel the attendance of absent members.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will say to the gentleman that we are willing to allow a vote on the bill if it be amended in that way. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. STORM. The bill is not before the House.

A MEMBER. And never will be.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House at this time for consideration, and debate is not in order.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in his custody Mr. HUNT, Mr. BARKSDALE, Mr. LYMAN, and Mr. WEMPLE.

The SPEAKER. Mr. HUNT, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HUNT. At about 5 o'clock I paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LYMAN], leaving my pair at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The House has heard the gentleman's statement; what action will it take?

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the excuse rendered by the gentleman ought to avail, and in speaking of his case I may extend my remarks to that of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LYMAN] who stands on his right. After this filibustering movement had begun, after it was evident that there would have to be a call of the House in order that the majority might assert itself, those gentlemen in my presence, and against my admonition or warning, deliberately paired and left the Hall. Now, sir, the rule of the House is that no member shall absent himself without the leave of the House. I want to know whether we are here acting a farce or are we here for the purpose of enforcing the rules and compelling the attendance of members. Neither of these gentlemen is old; neither is so venerable that he has any excuse on account of age. Both are young, active men, and they should have been here at their places. I think that unless we expect to perpetuate these farces the entire session, and every other session of which we shall be members, it is time to commence dealing with these recalcitrant members, these members who neglect their duty. I submit that the two gentlemen to whom I have referred, the one from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT] and the other from Massachusetts [Mr. LYMAN], ought to be fined, and certainly ought to pay the costs of the attachment.

The SPEAKER. What action will the House take upon the case of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT], whose case is alone before the House?

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SPRINGER, there were—ayes 47, noes 42.

Mr. HOPKINS. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BARKSDALE, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I admit that I have been absent without leave, and I throw myself on the indulgence of the House, with the explanation that I left the Hall at 5 o'clock, the usual hour of adjournment, when I supposed the House was on the eve of adjourning. If I had supposed that a measure of such importance as relief for the Mexican war veterans would have been before the House I would have been on hand.

Mr. GIBSON. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to, there being—ayes 48, noes 3.

The SPEAKER. Mr. LYMAN, you have been absent from the sitting of the House. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. LYMAN. May it please you, Mr. Speaker, I was paired. [Cries of "Louder!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend until order is restored in the House.

Mr. LYMAN. I supposed the House was about to adjourn.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. It is impossible to hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has appealed to the House to preserve order while these proceedings are going on.

Mr. LYMAN. Supposing the House was about to adjourn, Mr. Speaker, I paired with my friend from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT], and retired to partake of some refreshment. For, begging the pardon of the other gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS], he called me a young man, and I am old and well stricken enough in years to require periodical refreshment. [Laughter.] I hope the House will excuse me.

Mr. TUCKER. Why did you pair?

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the gentleman be excused. He did me a favor once; he loaned me an umbrella, and I want to repay him.

Mr. BLAND. I move that he be excused by assessing a small fine.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Let his case be referred to the Civil-Service Commission.

Mr. STRUBLE. I move that he be excused if he will sing a song.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion that the gentleman be excused.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 8.

So the motion to excuse was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. WEMPLE, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WEMPLE. I left here at 5 o'clock. I went out like the gentleman from Massachusetts, to get some refreshments. I returned on my own motion as soon as I could.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move that all further proceeding under the call be dispensed with; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays to see if a quorum is present.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, and Mr. GIBSON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 19, noes 101.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. ELLIS. I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. It can only be done by unanimous consent, the House having just voted down that motion and no business has intervened.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The motion was agreed to; and all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House second the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which has been read?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, and Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, resumed their places.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 140, noes 11.

Mr. HISCOCK. No quorum.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the House take a recess until—say, until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. REED. There is no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Still the Chair might put the question on the recess.

Mr. REED. It has already appeared by the vote by tellers that no quorum has voted, and our proceedings are suspended because there is no quorum. Furthermore, we are in the act of taking a vote.

The SPEAKER. It will not preclude the taking of the vote on the recess, but a quorum will be required.

Mr. REED. A recess can not be taken in the midst of a vote.

Mr. BAYNE. A motion to adjourn would be in order.

The SPEAKER. It has not been made.

Mr. BAYNE. But it would be in order.

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. BAYNE. I say it would.

The SPEAKER. And would take precedence of a motion to take a recess.

Mr. REED. A motion can not intervene while a vote is being taken, except to adjourn or that there be a call of the House. That results from the fact of there being no quorum.

Mr. HISCOCK. When the Speaker announced the vote the question of quorum was raised.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I understand the Chair has announced that no quorum is present. I move, therefore, for a call of the House. We have started into this business, now let us complete it. [Applause on the Democratic side].

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Would it be in order, with the consent of the gentleman who makes the motion [Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama], to take a yea-and-nay vote on the order for a second?

The SPEAKER. It would not, the Chair thinks. It is not provided for by the rules, but merely a vote by tellers.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask this question then: Would it not be in order to demand a yea-and-nay vote, and have the vote in that way if the House shall so determine?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would not. This is not a question of the passage of a resolution, but merely a method provided by the rules for ascertaining whether or not a certain question shall come before the House for its action.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I have no objection to having a call of the House; but I am satisfied that a quorum is present, and there is no necessity for filibustering on this question. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Georgia that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

The following members failed to answer:

Anderson,	Duncan,	Kean,	Randall,

The names of those not voting were then called for excuses.

Mr. FOLLETT. I would like to ask if my colleague Mr. JORDAN has not been excused by the House. I understood that he had been. I know that he is absent sick.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman's colleague has leave of absence.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. GEORGE D. WISE has leave of absence also.

The SPEAKER. Of course no action will be taken with reference to members who are absent by leave of the House.

Mr. BAGLEY. I ask unanimous consent that Mr. SPRINGER, of Illinois, be excused from further attendance on this day's session on account of sickness in his family. To my own knowledge his wife is quite ill.

Mr. SPRINGER was excused.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I now offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring before the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without leave of the House.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The doors will now be closed, and the Sergeant-at-Arms directed to compel the attendance of absent members.

Mr. FOLLETT. Mr. Speaker, I understand my colleague Mr. JORDAN has not yet been excused. I was under the impression that he had been. I now ask that he be excused on account of sickness.

There was no objection, and Mr. JORDAN was excused.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared before the bar of the House, having in custody, in obedience to its order, Mr. NEECE and Mr. PRYOR.

The SPEAKER. Mr. NEECE, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. NEECE. Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression that the House was going to adjourn, and, as I had some important business to attend to, at 5 o'clock, supposing the House would then adjourn, I went to attend to it.

Mr. FORNEY. I move that the gentleman be excused.

Mr. WILLIS. Would it be in order to ask a question of the gentleman, as I think many would be guided in our votes by the answer?

The SPEAKER. Of course by consent of the gentleman himself the question may be asked.

Mr. WILLIS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois, with his consent, if he came at once to the House as soon as he heard that it was in session?

Mr. NEECE. I did, sir.

Mr. WILLIS. Then I move that the gentleman be excused.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 1.

So Mr. NEECE was excused.

The SPEAKER. Mr. PRYOR, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its consent. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. Speaker, I accompanied my wife home at five minutes before 5 o'clock. In fact, it was suggested that the House would adjourn probably within the five minutes. Under that impression I remained at home, and knew nothing further of the action of the House until the Sergeant-at-Arms informed me that my presence was required.

Mr. FORNEY. I move that my colleague be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody, in obedience to its order, Mr. HENLEY.

The SPEAKER. Mr. HENLEY, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have to say in entire sincerity that when I left my house this morning a member of my family was taken ill with an attack of the measles. [Laughter.] That is the first time in my experience that I ever knew that statement to elicit amusement; but I suppose it is all right in Washington. [Renewed laughter.] And this afternoon at about 5 o'clock, having some solicitude in respect to the matter, I repaired home. That was before this proceeding for a call of the House had commenced. I knew nothing about these proceedings until I was advised by the myrmidons, if I may so term them, of the Sergeant-at-Arms [laughter] that my presence was required. I came at once——

A MEMBER. How about that dress suit?

Mr. HENLEY. Some gentleman desires to know something in respect to the matter of my habiliments. I have nothing to say about that at all. [Laughter.] I simply, Mr. Speaker, desire to state in perfect good faith that when I left the House of Representatives this afternoon it was in consequence of a feeling of solicitude in respect to the illness of a member of my household.

A MEMBER. You said that once before. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HENLEY. I did not anticipate that my presence would be required here to-night, and as soon as I found it was necessary I came at once.

Mr. GIBSON. If the gentleman will only divide his bouquet with us I will move he be excused.

Mr. TULLY. I think it is evident from the garb my colleague is in that he has been hunting the doctor. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana may ask the question if the gentleman from California gives his consent.

Mr. COBB. My question is whether it is necessary for the gentleman to wear such a suit of clothes when any of his family is sick.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I would like to ask the gentleman from California a question.

Mr. KING. I object.

Mr. GOFF. I move that the gentleman from California be excused.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 71, noes 10.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. Would it be in order to ask unanimous consent that the pages be allowed to go home—I mean those who can go?

The SPEAKER. The House has nothing to do with any such arrangement in regard to the pages. They are under the control of the Doorkeeper, who will let them go whenever he thinks he can dispense with their services.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. There is evidently a quorum present, and I hope we will now fix the day when we will consider this matter.

Mr. FIEDLER. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky will not prevail. I understand a certain member of this House, who has been sent for, has refused absolutely to come, and that there are now three deputies of the Sergeant-at-Arms after him. It is stated that the gentleman referred to is a Representative from Texas. If the fact be as is represented, I think it due to the dignity of the House that he should be brought here.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. It may be all very well to insist on bringing that gentleman here so that we may exercise our power over one member; but when a man is brought here we excuse him. We are simply punishing ourselves by staying here.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. GIBSON. May I ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is not upon the floor.

The motion of Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, was not agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I move that the House take a recess until half past 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order that that motion is not in order while this call of the House is proceeding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the motion is in order during the pendency of a call of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire whether the motion now made to take a recess can be entertained until proceedings under the present call are dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. HARDEMAN. Having made the motion that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring absent members to the bar, I would simply state, if I am in order, that if the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is agreed to I shall move to adjourn. If we are going to give up this fight, let us give it up at once.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDEMAN] is very much mistaken if he thinks I propose to give up the fight. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HOLMAN. I only make this motion to enable the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] to submit the motion which he desires to make. With that purpose, and that purpose only, I submit the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The question being taken on Mr. HOLMAN'S motion, the SPEAKER stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 69.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose it would be proper to call for tellers on the ground that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is not necessary upon that motion; but the gentleman has the right to call for tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I call for tellers.

On the question of ordering tellers, there were ayes 47—more than one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. HARDEMAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 97.

So the House refused to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. RAY, of New York. The gentleman from Vermont, Judge POLAND, is suffering from indisposition. He is an aged man. He is willing on all proper occasions to give his attendance here during the sittings of the House. But he has requested me to ask unanimous consent that his further attendance on this legislative day be dispensed with. I ask therefore unanimous consent that the gentleman be excused from further attendance during this legislative day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND], who he states is indisposed, be excused from further attendance during this legislative day. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I make the same request for myself. I am not aged, but I am not well enough to sit here. I have been suffering from a severe cold for weeks, and I do not think it is safe to remain longer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] asks to be excused from further attendance during this legislative day. Is there objection?

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I object.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] be excused from further attendance during this legislative day.

Mr. GIBSON. For what reason?

Mr. HISCOCK. For the reason which he has stated, that he is suffering from a severe cold.

The question being taken on Mr. HISCOCK'S motion, it was agreed to—ayes 58, noes 29.

Mr. HOLMAN (at 11.20 p. m.). I ask unanimous consent to be excused from further attendance during this day's session. For some weeks past I have been suffering from a very severe cold and my health is such that I ought not to have been here this evening up to this hour.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I move that my colleague [Mr. HOLMAN] be excused from further attendance during this legislative day.

The motion was agreed to, upon a division—ayes 68, noes 47.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It must be perfectly apparent from the number who have been excused and the number of members who are known to be out of the city that a quorum of this side of the House alone can not be secured to-night or to-morrow. I therefore move that all further proceedings under this call be dispensed with.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. We will excuse you, general.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN). The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 46, noes 93.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to be excused from further attendance during this day's session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER]?

Many members objected.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I move that the gentleman be excused from further attendance during this legislative day.

The motion was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 44, noes 91.

Mr. VANCE. I ask leave of absence for two hours. One of the pages of this House, five hundred miles from his home, is reported as being very sick with scarlet fever, and I feel that I ought to go and attend upon him. I have received a message from his attending physician that he needs a nurse, and I ask leave of absence for two hours. I will come back at the end of that time.

Mr. VALENTINE. Let the gentleman stay the remainder of the legislative day, if the boy has the scarlet fever.

Mr. VANCE. I am willing to come back at the end of two hours.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I move to amend by making it six hours

Mr. VANCE. I ask but two hours.

The question was taken; and upon a viva voce vote the Speaker pro tempore announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. VANCE. If gentlemen are really serious in their desire that this boy here under my care, five hundred miles from home, shall not receive my attention, I will withdraw the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The request of the gentleman is withdrawn.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody Mr. MAYBURY, Mr. MORSE, and Mr. HURD.

The SPEAKER. Mr. MAYBURY, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. MAYBURY. I remained here in the House, Mr. Speaker, and in my seat until the usual hour for adjournment. I have had serious illness in my family at my home, and was expecting information which was not delivered here at the House. I knew the state of mind that I was in would unfit me for partaking with dispassionate judgment in the deliberations of this body. I repaired to the hotel for the purpose of ascertaining if any dispatch awaited me there, but discovered that there was no message. I started to return to the House and was informed on the street that the House had adjourned. I went back to the hotel and was not informed until a few minutes ago that the House was in session. So soon as I ascertained that fact I came here to confess my transgression and ask pardon for my sin.

Mr. WINANS, of Michigan. I move that my colleague be excused for non-attendance.

The motion was agreed to, upon a division—ayes 67, noes 17.

The SPEAKER. Mr. MORSE, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. MORSE. I was not aware, Mr. Speaker, that the House was still in session; otherwise I certainly would have been here.

Mr. LONG. I move that the gentleman be excused.

Mr. GIBSON. I am opposed to that motion. I do not think the gentleman gives any pretense or offers any excuse for being absent. There is no reason why he should not know that this House was in session. As a member of this House it was his business to know when it met and when it adjourned.

It is not right or proper that a portion of the members of this House should be kept here all day and all night by other members leaving the Hall simply when they choose, without any excuse for it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If we are to conduct business here under the rules, we ought to proceed with some order and some regularity. Gentlemen come here and go away while the House is still in session, when they knew that this question was to come up; and the result of it is that because of this very absenteeism——

Several MEMBERS. Louder.

Mr. GIBSON. I can give gentlemen voice, but I can not give them understanding.

A MEMBER. That is old.

Mr. GIBSON. I say no excuse has been given why gentlemen should willfuly absent themselves from the House and leave the balance of us here all night to fight out the battle.

Mr. BARR. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] by imposing a fine of $500,000.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I move to amend so as to make it $10.

Mr. BARR. I accept the amendment. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] desire to have that amendment submitted to a vote?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I do.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] that his colleague [Mr. MORSE] be excused for non-attendance.

The motion was agreed to, upon a division—ayes 69, noes 9.

The SPEAKER. Mr. HURD, you also have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HURD. I left the House at 5 o'clock, being unwell; but I came back as soon as I knew my presence was required.

Mr. COSGROVE. I move that the gentleman be excused for non-attendance.

The motion was agreed to.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody Mr. HORR, of Michigan.

The SPEAKER. Mr. HORR, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HORR. I have no excuse to offer, with the exception that I left under the order of the House and did not know that the House was in session during this evening.

Mr. BARR (to Mr. HORR). What order of the House?

Mr. HORR. I am addressing the Speaker.

Mr. MCADOO (to Mr. HORR). You were not sick?

Mr. HORR. I was not. I do not think it necessary for me to go further into particulars.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to make his own excuse in his own way.

Mr. BEACH. I have not heard any excuse yet.

Mr. COSGROVE. I hope the gentleman will be excused on condition that he will vote when his name is called. I think it the veriest nonsense to have members brought in here and excused for non-attendance if they are to be allowed to refuse to vote when their names are called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of no process by which a member of the House can be compelled to vote.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. I move that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] be excused for non-attendance.

Mr. GIBSON. This is the first gentleman brought here that has not by his dress given evidence of having been out on a frolic. I think this gentleman ought to be excused.

The question being taken on the motion to excuse Mr. HORR, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 54, noes 21.

Mr. COBB. I desire to make inquiry whether members of this House when brought into the House under circumstances of this kind can absent themselves without leave, and if they do so——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let us have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the proceeding to compel the attendance of absent members. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] has indicated that he desires to make a parliamentary inquiry in reference to that matter.

Mr. COBB. And I am in order, notwithstanding the member from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in response to the gentleman from Indiana, will state that no member has a right to absent himself from the House without leave at any time, whether there be a call of the House or not. If a gentleman should leave the House without its consent during a call of the House the Chair thinks the House has the power to send for him and compel his attendance.

Mr. COBB. Then I move, if it be in order, that the roll be called for the purpose of ascertaining the names of those who——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There is a prisoner at the bar. The gentleman had better suspend for a few moments.

Mr. COBB. I will reserve my inquiry for the present.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in his custody Mr. OCHILTREE.

The SPEAKER. Mr. OCHILTREE, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. OCHILTREE. Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression that I was paired with the gentleman from New York [Mr. MULLER] on Saturday last and that the pair would extend until Tuesday.

A MEMBER. That is no excuse.

Mr. OCHILTREE. I did not know what the question was.

Mr. GIBSON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. OCHILTREE. Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON. I wish to ask the gentleman whether, when notified, on a former call of the House to-night, that his presence was required here, he did not positively refuse to come?

Mr. OCHILTREE. No, sir.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I move that the gentleman be excused.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I would like to ask the gentleman a few questions before we take a vote.

The SPEAKER. That may be done with the consent of the gentleman from Texas; not otherwise.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I will ask the gentleman at what time he left the House?

Mr. OCHILTREE. About 4 o'clock.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Was there any motion to adjourn pending at that time?

Mr. OCHILTREE. No, sir; I had an engagement.

The SPEAKER. It is moved that the gentleman from Texas be excused.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I do not think we ought to excuse the gentleman.

Mr. VAN EATON. If the gentleman be excused, I move that it be on the condition that he get us out of that scrape with Bismarck that he has got us into.

Mr. FIEDLER. I move to amend the motion for excusing the gentleman by providing that he be fined $500.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman wish to have that motion put to the House?

Mr. FIEDLER. In this case I had positive assurance that this gentleman refused to come; and I believe that any one who will take that position ought to be punished.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FIEDLER] moves to amend, so that the gentleman from Texas shall be excused upon the payment of $500.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I move to amend the amendment by making the fine 5 cents.

Several MEMBERS (to Mr. FIEDLER). Accept that amendment.

Mr. FIEDLER. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] desire to have his motion put?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do. I am in dead earnest on that.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. It is not in order.

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

The question being put on the amendment to the amendment, it was not agreed to.

The question then recurring on the amendment of Mr. FIEDLER, it was not agreed to.

The motion of Mr. STEWART, of Texas, that Mr. OCHILTREE be excused, was agreed to; there being—ayes 49, noes 9.

Mr. TALBOTT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Suppose a motion should now be adopted by the House to adjourn on the third Monday of next month, what would be the status of this committee in reference to the motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of fixing a day to consider this bill? Could the committee make a motion de novo, or would the present motion go over as unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. If a motion to adjourn should now be adopted the order for a call of the House and directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring in absentees would be vacated——

Mr. TALBOTT. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. And on the third Monday of next month this matter would come up as unfinished business.

Mr. TALBOTT. But will it be in order for the committee to make a motion to name any day other than that named now in the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that question when it is presented.

Mr. TALBOTT. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn, with the distinct understanding on the part of the House that on the third Monday of next month the Committee on Pensions, from which this resolution emanated, shall have the right to offer a resolution to name some future day for this business.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order as a motion. It may be agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. TALBOTT. Then I ask this House to agree to it.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. This will be the regular order under the rule on the third Monday of next month.

The SPEAKER. But it is not in order for the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] to make a motion to adjourn coupled with a condition.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much to impose the necessity upon any member to be brought here under the rules of the House. But at the same time——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman rises to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr WARNER, of Ohio. What is his parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not tell what it is.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not object to a parliamentary inquiry, but I do object to debate.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. COBB. I desire to say, sir, that it is the duty of every member to remain in his place.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is debate. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. COBB. When members are brought here, Mr. Speaker, have they a right to go away again without the leave of the House? Can they not be sent for and compelled to remain?

The SPEAKER. Members can not leave without the consent of the House.

Mr. COBB. I ask that members who have been brought here and gone away again shall be sent for in the proper way. I ask that an order be issued for their arrest.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no information on which to issue a warrant against any particular member unless it is first shown to the House that some member has absented himself without leave.

Mr. COBB. I move a call of the roll for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. It has been decided heretofore, when one or more members have absented themselves without leave after the call of the House had been ordered, the roll might be called for the purpose of ascertaining that fact, and if proved to be the fact, then the Speaker might issue his warrant on the order of the House to bring them in.

Mr. COBB. I say there are two who have so absented themselves.

Several MEMBERS. Name them.

Mr. COBB. And perhaps more. I am not required to state their names.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves a call of the roll be had for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not members who responded to the call in the first instance have since absented themselves without leave of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll was then called; and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Anderson,	Brumm,	Culbertson, W. W.	Findlay,
Barbour,	Buckner,	Cullen,	Finerty,

Lore,	Phelps,	Stone,

The SPEAKER. The roll-call disclosed the presence of two hundred members.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that my colleague Mr. BINGHAM be excused from further attendance during this legislative day. I will state for the information of the House that his wife is seriously ill, and he is compelled most of his time to be in attendance.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. How long has he been absent?

Mr. BAYNE. He was here this afternoon, but in consequence of his wife's sickness he has not been regular in his attendance upon the sittings of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I know myself that she is very ill.

Mr. BEACH. I am aware of the fact stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will not object.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. My only object was to ascertain the facts. I think it is time for us to know what we are doing in reference to granting these requests.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that his colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] be excused?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I move that my colleague Mr. EATON be excused. He has been quite unwell for several days to my knowledge. During the early part of the day he came to my seat and told me he was feeling too unwell to remain. He went away quite early in the day.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Do I understand that the gentleman from Connecticut asks that his colleague be excused from further attendance?

The SPEAKER. That is the gentleman's request.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Has he answered a roll-call to-day?

Mr. SEYMOUR. I know he has been here to-day, but, as I have said, he left very early. I do not think he has been here since 12 o'clock. He has been confined to his room for several days.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Has he been here since 5 o'clock?

Mr. SEYMOUR. No, sir; not to my knowledge.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. If the gentleman is ill, I have nothing to say about it; but I do not desire to excuse Democrats who are able to be here. As far as the other side is concerned they can all go if they want to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut, that his colleague be excused for the reason stated.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, Mr. COX, of New York, left the House a short time ago and requested me to say in his behalf that he had been up for a night or two and was actually sick and unable to remain. I move that he be excused.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 60.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ascertain from the roll-call what members, if any, who answered to their names when the call was first made are now absent from the House without leave. [After a pause.] The Chair is advised that of the members who answered to their names on the first call the following members are now absent: The gentleman from Missouri, Mr. BUCKNER; the gentleman from New York, Mr. COX, and the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. PETTIBONE.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. In behalf of Mr. PETTIBONE I wish to say that he has not been absent from the House. He is now resting upon one of the lounges in the Hall.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee will be recorded as present.

Mr. COBB. I now offer this resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House the following-named members, who have absented themselves without leave of the House since the roll was called, namely, SAMUEL S. COX and AYLETT H. BUCKNER.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 31.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I rise to a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Was not the Sergeant-at-Arms instructed to bring in the absentees?

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms is now engaged in executing the orders of the House, by serving the warrants signed by the Speaker, to bring to the bar of the House those members who have absented themselves without leave since the call of the House was ordered.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Under that prior order would he not bring in the gentlemen named in that resolution?

The SPEAKER. They are not included in the first order. They were present and answered to their names.

The resolution of Mr. COBB was agreed to.

Mr. HENLEY. I move to reconsider the vote just taken.

Mr. COBB. I move to lay that motion upon the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 28.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, on account of his well-known lameness, I ask that Mr. WADSWORTH be excused from attendance on this session of the House.

Mr. GIBSON. Is it a lameness from which he now suffers?

Mr. PARKER. Yes, sir. His lameness results from having been thrown from his carriage.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. WADSWORTH was excused.

Mr. HART. I desire to ask leave of absence for one hour, to escort members of my family home, who are absent without attendants.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that he be excused for one hour.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 26. So the motion was agreed to.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in his custody Mr. BELFORD, Mr. ELLWOOD, and Mr. BRUMM.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BELFORD, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Speaker, while I was bending down on my knees [cries of "Oh!" "Oh!"] between the dividing of the day and night, praying the Lord to relieve the Treasury of its surplus, I was assailed by the Sergeant-at-Arms, who compelled me to come here. I was at the Capitol this morning at 9 o'clock. I devoted three hours to the Committee on Public Lands, staid at the House until 5 o'clock, had a dinner party at my house at half past 5, and I left in the happy expectation that the fraternal feeling prevailing here would enable the Democrats and the Republicans to adjourn in a decent season. I have offered no disrespect to the House, and had I conceived that the session would last beyond half past 5, I certainly would have remained. But I offer this as my apology, and the only apology I can present—let us unlock the vaults of the Treasury [much laughter] and turn the one hundred and fifty millions of surplus revenue into the channels of trade and business in order that the honest, industrious, and energetic people of this country may be benefited. [Applause.]

Mr. GIBSON. As the gentleman is so desirous of opening the doors of the Treasury I move to open the doors of his own pocket by fining him $10 for his absence.

Mr. BELFORD. I am ready to pay it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move that the gentleman from Colorado be excused.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] moves——

Mr. GIBSON. I withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] moves that the gentleman from Colorado be excused.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 53, noes 8.

The SPEAKER. Mr. ELLWOOD, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. ELLWOOD. I remained here until, I think, half past 5 o'clock. I voted to adjourn. I supposed the House would adjourn. I had some company awaiting me at the door, and I went out in good faith believing the House would adjourn and went to my room. That is the only excuse I have got. If I had supposed for one moment the House would not adjourn I should not have gone.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move that my colleague be excused.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to ask the gentleman if before he left this fight had not commenced.

Mr. ELLWOOD. No, sir; I did not dream of any fight. I supposed the House would adjourn.

The motion of Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BRUMM, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, "the very head and front of my offending hath this extent no more:" It was very near 6 o'clock, and I was very hungry, and had company for dinner. I had made an engagement, and left supposing, of course, there would be nothing of importance going on here, but that the House would adjourn. That is all I have to say.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that my colleague be excused.

Mr. REESE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BRUMM. Certainly.

Mr. REESE. Was the gentleman not present and did he not take part in this filibustering when it began, and left the House without leave?

Mr. HORR. Who have been filibustering?

Mr. REESE. That side of the House.

The SPEAKER. It is moved that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be excused.

Mr. MORRISON. We must draw the line somewhere.

The question being taken on Mr. BAYNE'S motion, there were—ayes 42, noes 52.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, 38 members voting therefor; and Mr. BAYNE and Mr. GIBSON were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 76.

The SPEAKER. The "noes" have it, and the House refuses to excuse the gentleman from Pennsylvania. What action will the House take?

Mr. LAMB. In view of the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania was here when the filibustering movement began on the other side of the House, I move that he be fined $5.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I object to the term "filibustering." The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] voted to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. That, I presume, is debatable.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I have been a humble member of the House for now nearly seven years. I have witnessed proceeding of this kind at every session of the Congress of the United States. I have in common perhaps with many others regretted the character of these proceedings. Under the rules it is the duty of every member of Congress to be present during the sessions of the House. [Cries of "Cut it short!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not know, sir, that I am to be protected from insults direct and indirect from gentlemen who may assume to occupy a different position from myself——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to preserve order on the floor while the gentleman from Indiana is addressing the House.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I was saying that I believe it to be the duty of every gentleman who represents a constituency to be here during sessions of the House. I have never known an instance in the seven years in which the presence of a gentleman has been censured or that on account of it he has been reprimanded or subjected to any punishment whatever. It is so universally known that the proceedings under the call of the House are a mere farce, that no member has believed himself under any obligations to be here. I state that because it is a fact, and I think every gentleman recognizes it to be a fact. The rules require members of the House to be here. That is not controverted; but what is the truth? It is known that when gentlemen are arraigned for violation of this rule, any excuse, the more farcical the better, is received by this House. No man is punished; nobody is reprimanded; until it is understood that any gentleman may absent himself with impunity. And what happens when he is brought here? He is arraigned at our bar, and the Speaker very solemnly informs him that he has been absent from the House without its consent and asks him to render an excuse. Any excuse is accepted. To be sure, upon the first vote at least there is a negative; he is not excused. But when there is a division of the House he is excused.

Now let us end this farce. I wish that the constituencies of the members of the House could be assembled here in the galleries and see these fool-boy performances that we exhibit here upon every question of this kind. What I insist upon is this: if there be a rule and it has been violated, that we consider it with that degree of solemnity that ought to characterize proceedings of this kind. We are the Representatives of thirty-eight States, of over fifty millions of a constituency.

They expect their Representatives to be here whenever there is business of the people to be transacted. If members absent themselves without leave, they are subject to the rules. Yet when they are brought here, I say it with regret, we turn the whole proceedings into a farce. It is time this thing were ended. I say it to the Representatives of the people here, it is time it were ended.

Mr. GIBSON. We propose to end it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Ah!——.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It can be ended very soon if members will only vote.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Gentlemen on the other side need not speak in that way in regard to the subject of such proceedings as these. If there has been a violation of the rules, and if these proceedings have been turned into a comedy, gentlemen on the other side are as much responsible as are we on this.

Rules have been prescribed for the government of the deliberations of this body. If gentlemen say that we have failed to respond to our names when called for the purpose of breaking a quorum, let me call their attention to what they have uniformly done when they have been in the minority from the Forty-third Congress until the present time.

I do not vindicate what they have done, and I am not justifying what has been done on this side. I am not speaking upon that question. But I say men are brought into the presence of the Speaker for having violated the rules of this House, and I insist that when that is done they ought to be treated with some degree of decorum; that is all.

I insist that if this thing is to be made a farce, then let us resolve in advance that it shall be so. Let us not go through the form of arraigning gentlemen for having violated the rules of the House by absenting themselves from its sessions without leave, and having arraigned them here, after an excuse has been rendered, then everybody on both sides of the House on the first vote respond in the negative against excusing such members from punishment or censure, and then when a division is called we universally vote to excuse.

Now I ask in the name of the people, I demand in the name of the rules of this House, that we shall be decorous. If members of this House have violated the rules, and when arraigned for it have no good excuse to give therefor, then let us affix some degree, some character of punishment. If their excuse is sufficient in the opinion of the House, then let them go quit; that is what I ask; let them go quit.

But it is understood, everybody understands it, that the rules of the House may be set at defiance by any member, and that when arraigned any excuse he may offer will be regarded as a sufficient one. I wish it were possible that the fifty millions of people that we represent might be assembled here in the galleries and look down upon the grand farce that is enacted on every occasion when there is a call of the House. I wish the American people could see us as we see ourselves.

If the House wlll pardon me for saying so, these proceedings are disreputable. They tend to bring the American Congress into contempt, and we deserve the contempt of our constituencies for the manner in which this thing is done.

Mr. GIBSON. We will allow you to characterize your actions, but not ours.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I characterize my own so far as they may be subject to the censure of the people and so far as they may be against the rules of proceedings in this House. It is time that this thing were at an end. It is due to our own reputation, it is due to our own character, it is due to the intelligent constituencies that we represent, if the rules made by the House are not to be respected, that they should be repealed, abrogated, set at defiance, and the people be admonished in advance that this thing is intended to be but a farce. That is what I am speaking about.

I undertake to say that in the seven years that I have had the honor to represent an intelligent constituency upon this floor I have not pursued, I have not encouraged, directly or indirectly, the character of proceedings that has brought or should have brought the American Congress into contempt.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] states that he rises to a question of order.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not wish to take the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] from the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. What I ask now is nothing more than this, that we shall proceed under the rules of the House; that is all. I think our constituencies expect it. I think they have a right to demand it.

I have opposed, so far as I knew how under the rules, the consideration of the measure which it has been proposed to bring forward. But I am willing that the whole question shall be considered under the recognized rules of this House. But I have felt—I say it regretfully—I have felt humiliated that the Speaker of this House should be called upon to preside over this body at a time when everybody, on both sides, seems disposed to bring the proceedings which are recognized by our rules, and ought to be solemn proceedings, into contempt and disrepute by the manner in which this thing is done here.

Why can not we proceed in order, arraign at the bar of the House gentlemen here who are charged with a violation of our rules, and determine the question calmly, dispassionately, determine it as we ought, as a judicial body considering the question of whether or not its rules have been violated?

I want it understood that now and hereafter and forever I protest against this character of proceedings, which, if you will permit me to say it, have certainly not reflected any very considerable honor and credit upon us for the manner in which this body of Representatives of the people have acted in this matter.

I know gentlemen will believe that what I have said has been said in the best of faith and with a desire that we may come down to something like the proceedings that ought to characterize a deliberative assembly representing large and intelligent constituencies all over the country. I protest against the manner in which these things have been done; I protest seriously and candidly, and I desire that this protest shall be known at least to the constituency which I have the honor to represent.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to my colleague from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] with somewhat of surprise. He arose to oppose the motion which I have made. Yet every word that he uttered was a word which showed that the motion ought to be adopted. He stated that the proceedings connected with the call of the House, whenever such a call has been had, have become a farce in the eyes of every member. It was for this reason, Mr. Speaker, and for this alone—for I had no unkind feeling toward the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM]—that I made my motion.

What is the case this evening—or rather this morning, for it is now nearly 2 o'clock? For more than seven hours the majority of this House has been attempting not to obtain recognition of the rights of the soldiers of the Mexican war, but to have a day fixed when those men who have in years gone by battled for the best part of the country which we now own can have a hearing; and the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. BROWNE] was the man of all others who led the movement on this floor to defraud those men of the rights that they ought to have.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a question of order. My question is whether the bill is now before the House for debate?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. LAMB. I do not propose to discuss the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will confine himself to the question before the House, which is whether or not the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall be fined in the sum of $5.

Mr. LAMB. Yes, sir; I propose to give my reasons upon that proposition. I stated how this question came here. I stated that the gentleman from Indiana was the first of all others who caused the "farcical proceedings," as he calls them, which have taken place on this floor, and the responsibility for which he now tries to shoulder upon somebody else. Other gentlemen have come here and have tendered their excuses for absenting themselves, but when the gentleman from Pennsylvania took his place at the bar of the House he admitted when he was questioned that he was here when this subject first came up, that he took part in the filibustering movement of his side of the House, that he did what was in his power to prevent a vote being taken, and when the House was in such a situation that he did not believe a vote could be taken he put on his coat and hat and left the House. And then he comes back here without a word of apology for having kept this House in session until 2 o'clock in the morning. Therefore it was I asked this House to set an example and put a stop to the farcical proceedings that my colleague from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] says have for so long a time disgraced this House and brought it into contempt before the people of the country.

I am glad the people of the country are not here to witness the proceedings that have gone on to-night. I for one am willing to give my vote now to make a record here which will in the future deter every member upon any side of the House from conduct which may bring this Congress into contempt in the eyes of any man within the length and breadth of this land. [Applause.] And I trust that the Democratic side of this House will set an example which has never been set before, to teach members of the House that their place is here, unless under the rules they are excused.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the House to the bill alluded to by the gentleman who has just taken his seat. He said—— [Cries of "Order!"] I propose to discuss the question which has been discussed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LAMB].

Mr. TUCKER. I rise to a point of order. As I understand, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LAMB] was called to order a few moments ago because he seemed to refer to the provisions of that bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. And he was allowed to proceed.

Mr. TUCKER. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] proposes to refer to that bill and discuss it; and I say he is out of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. I propose, Mr. Speaker, to confine myself to the case which is before the House; and, as bearing upon that question, I propose to call attention to the bill to which the gentleman from Indiana has alluded. I shall endeavor to keep myself——

Mr. TUCKER. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman from New York is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state as distinctly as he can what is the question before the House. It is whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] shall be fined in the sum of $5 for non-attendance upon the session of the House. When the point of order was made against the gentleman from Indiana who has just taken his seat the Chair admonished that gentleman that he must confine himself to that question.

Mr. HISCOCK. And did he? I ask the Speaker whether he did; whether there was any further objection to his continuing?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I make the point of order that the House in the absence of a quorum can not impose any fine.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] has the floor.

Mr. HISCOCK. I propose to confine myself as literally to the question before the House as did the gentleman who has just taken his seat. We have been told, Mr. Speaker, that we are in contempt; that we are presenting an unbecoming spectacle to the country because we have dared to resist the passage of this bill. I say to you on the other side that you have a majority over a quorum of this House; a majority of over sixty to seventy members. You have the control of the legislation of this country.

Several MEMBERS. And we mean to do it.

Mr. MORRISON. And you try to prevent it.

Mr. HISCOCK. And you propose to fine the gentleman from Pennsylvania because he was derelict in his attendance on this House, while you have seventy members here more than a quorum.

Mr. MORRISON. We have not been skulking away like your men and refusing to vote.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Illinois—— [Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will suspend until gentlemen take their seats. This is a matter deserving serious attention.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Illinois, the leader of the House, the Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, answers my interrogatories by saying that [cries of "Order!"]—that the members on the other side have skulked rather than vote for the bill which is presented here. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. WILLIS. Each member must be in his seat. The gentleman addressing the Chair must do so from his seat.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am addressing the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks gentlemen to take their seats. They must suspend their remarks until the order of the Chair is obeyed. There is no necessity for confusion and excitement. This discussion can be conducted in order, and the Chair will see that it is.

Mr. HISCOCK. The remark I made was that the Democracy upon this floor had from sixty to seventy members over a majority, and I was interrupted by the leader of the House on the other side, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who told me his Democratic associates had skulked from this House to-night. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. MORRISON. I said no such thing.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understood the gentleman to say that they had skulked away. Every man within the sound of my voice and the reach of my arm so understood him. [Cries of "Order!"] One of the leading candidates for the position which you now occupy was here and voted when the roll-call was first made, but has left this House, has gone from it. Why? Why has this majority on the other side gone away? Look at the bill you talk about and which you undertake to palm off as a bill for the relief of the Mexican soldiers. [Cries of "Order!"] You don't care to have it read. ["Order!"] Do you shrink from hearing it read? ["Order!"] Do you shrink from hearing the bill you propose to vote for in this House? ["Order!"]

Mr. TUCKER. I call the member from New York to order.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Virginia calls me to order.

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. HISCOCK. Because you are unwilling to have it advertised to the country. [Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will restore order. Gentlemen will resume their seats.

Mr. TUCKER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TUCKER. I understood the Speaker to rule that it was out of order for the member from New York to refer to the bill. I ask now whether it is in order for him to discuss the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that it was out of order on this motion for a gentleman to discuss the merits of the bill, and that was all. The Chair did not undertake to decide that it was out of order for the gentleman to refer to the bill.

Mr. TUCKER. Is it in order for the member from New York to read the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know for what purpose the gentleman proposes to read the bill.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I want to know if it was in order for the gentleman who addressed the House just before the gentleman from New York took the floor to refer to the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will repeat that no decision was made to the effect that it was out of order to refer to the bill; but simply that it was not in order to discuss on this question the merits of the bill. The only question before the House at the present time, as the Chair stated, is whether or not the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall be fined for non-attendance at this sitting of the House.

Mr. TUCKER. I understood the member from New York to say——

Mr. HISCOCK. Say "the gentleman from New York."

Mr. HARDEMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. TUCKER. I understood "the gentleman from New York" to say that he was going to read the bill for the purpose of showing why the members of this side of the House and what members on this side of the House were absent from it.

The SPEAKER. With the reason which the gentleman from New York may have for reading the bill the Chair has nothing to do. With the reason that the gentleman from New York may give for opposing the proposition with reference to the gentleman from Pennsylvania now at the bar of the House the Chair has nothing to do. The Chair simply decides that the gentleman from New York cannot, in order, on this question, discuss the merits of the bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, no, Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention——

Mr. HARDEMAN. I have risen to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I wish to ask if the reading of a bill is not in the nature of a discussion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman as a part of his remarks might read extracts from the History of the United States or from any other work if he so desired. Whether it would present a sufficient reason why the pending motion should not prevail is not for the Chair to determine. The gentleman from New York will proceed.

Mr. HISCOCK. And now, Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed to continue my remarks without further interruption, I will attempt to do so in order, so that no gentleman on the other side of the House will have occasion to find fault with me.

I have addressed myself, sir, to the reason why the gentleman from Pennsylvania should be excused. The reason I was about to urge was that from eighty to ninety, I do not know but that there may be one hundred, stalwart, unterrified Democrats on the other side of the House, in the language of the gentleman from Illinois, have "skulked" from the House because they are afraid of making a record upon this bill.

Mr. MORRISON. That statement is not true. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. HISCOCK. We have been told by the gentleman from Indiana that this bill that we sought to secure passage of in this House was a bill for the relief of, or for the granting of pensions to, the Mexican soldiers, the survivors of them, or their legal representatives.

I can appeal to gentlemen here, Mr. Speaker, and to the RECORD that early in this discussion I said from my place on this floor that if the other side should bring in a bill for the relief of the Mexican soldiers, a bill providing pensions for them, that we would vote on that bill at once, and not delay it, as proposed in this resolution, to a distant day fixed for its discussion.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. You never did vote for it. That proposition never was made.

Mr. HISCOCK. I did not say that I would vote for the bill, but that this side of the House would vote upon the bill [derisive shouts on the Democratic side] and that no question of a quorum would be raised. I did not undertake to bind the individual conscience of any man upon this side of the House. But I did give you, with the knowledge and assent of every man on this side of the House, the information and assurance that no question of a quorum should be raised upon the bill if you even pressed it to a passage at once. You had full and positive information that we would not object to the consideration of the bill giving a pension to Mexican soldiers, simply reserving the individual rights of members to act as in their individual judgment they might see proper.

Mr. COBB. I insist, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from New York is going beyond the limit to which he is permitted to go by the rules.

Mr. HISCOCK. And why is it, Mr. Speaker, that the other side of the House is so intensely excited over the question of what is in this bill? They show manifestly that they are afraid to have it read, and now it is my intention—— [Loud cries of "Order!" from the Democratic side.]

Mr. COBB. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I insist that if the gentleman from New York is to be interrupted it should be by one gentleman at a time.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Indiana desires to make a point of order against the gentleman from New York he has the floor for that purpose. The Chair will hear it now.

Mr. COBB. My point of order is this, that the gentleman from New York is not discussing the question before the House and is traveling outside of it and discussing the merits of this bill. I insist that under the ruling of the Chair he must confine himself to the subject legitimately before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will confine himself to the question under debate. The Chair does not understand that the gentleman from New York is discussing the merits of the bill, but that he has stated a simple proposition which he made on behalf of his side of the House.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I make the point of order that under Rule XV all these proceedings are out of order. That rule provides that a majority of the members present may send for, order in arrest, and secure the attendance of absent members. But when that is done the House alone can determine under what conditions they may be excused. I hold that the words "the House" in the last clause of Rule XV mean a quorum.

The SPEAKER. Has it yet appeared that a quorum does not vote on this proposition? Until the vote is taken the point of order which the gentleman from Ohio makes can not arise. Until the vote is taken the Chair does not know whether a quorum has voted or not on the motion to fine the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TALBOTT. I make the point of order that no gentleman can discuss upon this motion anything except whether the excuse offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is sufficient.

The SPEAKER. The House has refused to excuse the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and has thereby decided inferentially at least that the excuse is not sufficient. The present motion is to fine the member.

Mr. TALBOTT. My point of order is that you can not in the debate on the pending question go beyond the discussion of the excuse offered by the member.

The SPEAKER. The House has voted on the excuse offered by the member.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Under what rule of the House does this discussion continue?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LAMB] moves to fine the gentleman from Pennsylvania $5 for non-attendance. That is a debatable question unless the previous question is demanded and ordered by the House. And the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] is debating that question.

Mr. HISCOCK. Now, I was endeavoring to point out a reason why the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] should not be fined. I was endeavoring to convince the other side of the House that when this bill was offered here ninety of their own members absented themselves from voting on the bill.

Mr. TALBOTT. I ask the gentleman has any member of a legislative body a right to leave because he does not want to vote on a proposition pending?

Mr. PAYNE. I rise to a question of order. It is that gentlemen on the other side should retain their seats and keep order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] can not be interrupted under the rule of the House except by his own consent, and the Chair is endeavoring to enforce that rule.

Mr. HISCOCK. Now I will go back again. I was endeavoring to excuse the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] for the reason that ninety members on the other side of the House had seen fit to leave the House pending its deliberations that they might not—I will not say skulk—but that they might avoid making a record upon this bill.

And this, Mr. Speaker, is not a bill to pension the Mexican soldier. Now I hope the other side of the House are entirely willing that this bill should be read. The country will know that you are compelled to meet that question. The elements of this bill will be discussed. They have gone forth upon the wings of lightning to every corner of this country, and you will be compelled to meet the question upon this bill. The question we are to meet as partisans here is whether we are justified in refusing to vote consideration to the bill which has been presented, as I understand, by the unanimous vote of the majority of the committee that have it in charge.

Is it, Mr. Speaker, a bill to pension the soldiers of the Mexican war? Let us read a little further. After it has finished with the Mexican soldier, then it proceeds to say:

Or who served thirty days in the Creek war or disturbances—

of 1835 and 1836.

What disturbances, Mr. Speaker? What does this language cover? What is the feast that you have invited us here to partake of?

Or in the Florida war with the Seminoles from 1835 to 1842, or in the Black Hawk war of 1832, and were honorably discharged, and such other officers and soldiers and sailors as have been personally named in the resolutions of Congress for any specific service.

Why we are invited here to vote for men that participated in "disturbances"—not in war, but in "disturbances." What does that expression cover? What does it contemplate? And yet we find the Democratic party to be standing here with a solid front and insisting that this bill shall be pushed through the American Congress.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is not true.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am told by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that that is not true. That gentleman is in the line upon every vote taken in this House to force the consideration of this bill. It has been a party question from the time it came before us until this present time. And we on this side of the House have felt we were justified by every means known to the Constitution in resisting the passage of this bill. And I say to you that with the overwhelming majority that you have here, not a quorum merely, you can take the control of the legislation of this country.

Mr. ELLIS. That is what we mean to do.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Louisiana says that is what they mean to do.

Mr. ELLIS. It is.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman repeats that that is what they mean to do. It is because of the determination of the gentleman from Louisiana and of other gentlemen that they mean to do this sort of thing that we have felt justified in standing here upon our constitutional rights and resisting the passage of that bill in the face and in the eyes of the fact that the Democracy have such an overwhelming force and such an overwhelming power in this House.

Mr. ELLIS. We intend to assert the rights of the majority.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will not interrupt the gentleman from New York without his consent.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Louisiana tells us that he intends to assert the rights of the majority. You have the majority. You have it overwhelmingly. The people of the United States gave it to you. But so far as we, a feeble minority, have the power to prevent bad legislation, understanding what your threat is, what your purpose is, understanding the solid phalanx that is presented on the other side—we on this side of the House felt that we were justified in resisting this bill, as I have said, by all the power and by all the means known to the Constitution.

Mr. LAMB. I call the previous question on my motion.

Mr. BRUMM. I hope not until I have been heard.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HISCOCK. I say again to you gentlemen that if you will present a bill here to this House which is for the Mexican soldier and none but the Mexican soldier, no obstruction will be offered to the bill except that we may vote against it, but each member will vote as he chooses.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. If we intend to act with dignity upon this matter, order should be preserved in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he has endeavored to maintain and preserve order in the House. If order is not preserved, the Chair begs leave to say that it is the fault of gentlemen themselves.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have said that so far as this side of the House was concerned, the Republican side of the House, it will offer no unusual obstruction to a bill of the character I have indicated, but each member will reserve to himself the right to vote as he pleases upon any bill you will bring in here to pension the Mexican soldier alone. But when by party whip, by party discipline, you attempt to force through this House a bill which provides for pensioning people who were engaged in "disturbances" we shall resort to every means we have the right to under the Constitution to defeat such legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I will inquire how much time I have left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has twenty-five minutes.

Mr. HISCOCK. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED. I desire to confine what I have to say to the point actually in issue, which is: Shall the member from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] be fined by the House? We all know that that would be a violation of what has grown to be one of the customs of this House; I mean the custom to excuse a member brought in here on occasions like this, who makes an excuse similar to that which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has made.

The action proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LAMB] can be justified here and now only upon the ground of punishing the gentleman from Pennsylvania for some misbehavior in which we on this side of the House have participated. Are you willing to go to the country presenting this spectacle—a Democratic House two hundred strong, unable to get within sixty of your membership here, and yet punishing a gentleman on this side of the House because he was doing just what sixty of your own members have done? [Applause on the Republican side.]

You had an opportunity to take this matter into your own hands. We offered you complete control of this House, and you did not dare to take it; and the country knows why. It is because you did not dare to trust yourselves; you knew yourselves better than we did. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Here you have been struggling all night long, two hundred strong, to pass a bill which your gentle hearts are set upon, to pay men for Creek wars and disturbances of 1835 or some other unknown period, and it has come down to this, that you solidify at last upon a fine of $5 against the member from Pennsylvania. And the majestic heart of the Democratic party is just now stirred in pursuit of the Hon. S. S. COX and another of your leaders who seem somehow or other to have escaped. [Renewed laughter.]

Now, do you think this is a spectacle that you can afford to submit to this country? This is right to the point; this is on the question of whether you purpose to fine the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Why, you are only going to emphasize yourselves; that is all. You certainly do not want to do that.

The best thing on earth you can do is to go quietly away and—try to make the country think that this thing has never occurred. Now, is not what I have said directly to the point?

I submit it to the candid judgments of the men I see before me, calmed and soothed by what I have said. [Laughter.] I see that conviction has entered your minds. I see that the situation in which the ardor of my friend from Indiana [Mr. LAMB] has brought you is beginning to dawn upon you. Now, gentlemen, it seems to me that you ought to do simply your duty, and not undertake to make a scapegoat of somebody here.

I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE].

Mr. BAYNE. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that any feeling has arisen about this bill or that any feeling has arisen because of the proceedings that have taken place here to-night.

I was one of those who voted with the Democratic party in favor of the rules which are now in force. I voted against the rules proposed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], which would have given a bare majority the power and the right to have taken up this bill or any other whenever they chose to do so. I cast that vote in favor of the rules which the Democratic party sustain in this House because I believe that the less we legislate the better it is for the country. I am opposed to legislation except the passage of the necessary appropriation bills. It was for that reason I voted with you, and it was for that reason I voted against the proposition of the gentleman from Maine.

And now, because the rules which you have adopted prevent anything less than a quorum of your own party from taking up a measure, because we are enabled under your own rules to defeat you this night in your efforts to fix a day for the consideration of this bill, will you visit your anger upon a gentleman who takes advantage of the very rules you have laid down, an advantage which you yourselves have given him?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. No; it was because he left the House in violation of the rules.

Mr. BAYNE. Others have left the House. Do you propose to deal harshly with them?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Where are your own fellows that you have not got here?

Mr. BAYNE. As the gentleman from Maine has said, there are fifty or sixty of your own members who are absent from your own side of the House. Do you propose to deal harshly with them? And there are others on this side of the House who are absent.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] left the House after this contest began.

Mr. BAYNE. When gentlemen characterize the conduct of my colleague [Mr. BRUMM] as a violation of the rules, I simply want to say that it is what they themselves invited him to do and what I invited him to do when I voted for those rules. It is the privilege of any member on this floor to vote or not to vote, as he may see fit. My colleague exercised simply that privilege. His presence here would have availed nothing, for he would not have voted on any substantial proposition which would have given you a quorum on this measure. He would not have voted upon any question which would have helped to secure the passage of your resolution.

Now, are you going to single him out and impose a penalty upon him? I say to gentlemen that this is not the thing to do. It is a sort of thing which will recoil. This is not the way to treat a member who has acted just as forty, fifty, sixty, seventy, or eighty other members of the House have acted.

Mr. HOPKINS. Do not the rules require every member present to vote upon every question submitted?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. And has not your side repeatedly violated that rule ever since the Forty-third Congress?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BAYNE. The gentleman knows as well as I do, for he has been here before, that although the rules require a member to vote, those rules are a dead letter and can not be enforced. It has been decided over and over again that a member of Congress can not be compelled to vote. Speaker Blaine, in one of his decisions, very aptly illustrated the matter when he said you might lead a horse to the trough, but you could not compel him to drink. No gentleman here can be compelled to vote. I claim it to be my right as a Representative on this floor to vote or not to vote on my responsibility not to this House but to my constituents. That is all the prerogative my colleague exercised—the privilege of not voting. I beg gentlemen of the House not to decide this question in any spirit of excitement, for we ought to approach the matter calmly; we ought to treat it in a judicial spirit. I beg of you to treat my colleague as others have been treated here—no better, no worse, but in the same way.

Mr. HENLEY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BAYNE. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes.

Mr. HENLEY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE], who now addresses the House has earned a very well-deserved reputation all over the House for candor and fairness. I wish to ask him whether he does not think that the case of his colleague, who was here when this filibustering commenced, and who was in contempt of the order of the House, is properly to be distinguished from the cases of gentlemen who left here this afternoon in ignorance that there was going to be a night session. This was the case with the seventy Democrats that the gentleman from New York has spoken about.

Mr. BAYNE. In reply to that I will simply say you may call it filibustering or whatever else you please. I call it the privilege and right of a member to vote or not to vote as he sees fit. The presence of my colleague here would not have amounted to anything; he would have refused to vote so as to give you a quorum to pass the resolution for the consideration of this bill. If he had been here he would have refused to vote; so that it was the same thing whether he was absent or present.

I trust that what I have said will have influence and effect so far as my voice can reach, in order that my colleague may be dealt with fairly, that he shall not be singled out from the members of this House who have had to make excuses this night, and others who may hereafter make excuses.

I yield the residue of my time to my colleague [Mr. BRUMM], who desires to make an explanation.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] who has not yet been discharged by the House will occupy the time granted him by his colleague.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to ask whether a member of the House in the discussion of any question can "farm out" his time to any other member.

The SPEAKER. Every gentleman who occupies the floor in his own right is under the rules entitled to an hour. If he does not wish to occupy that time himself he may, according to a practice which has prevailed in this House almost from time immemorial, yield a portion of his hour to other gentlemen.

Mr. BELFORD. That may be the practice, but it is a practice "more honored in the breach than in the observance."

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I confess that this matter seems to have given me, or to be giving me, more notoriety than I really court, or than is, under any circumstances, pleasant to me. Were it simply that I were to speak to members of this House I would at this time not say one word, but leave this House to use their judgment and do just as they please under the explanation and apology I have made. But inasmuch as these discussions and this fact will be published to the country, and especially to my constituents, and that I am afraid that they might misconstrue my action and your action, I think it is due to myself and to them that I should state just exactly the facts as they occurred and my views on them.

The gentleman who made the motion to fine me $5 is laboring under a very great mistake when he says, or any other gentleman says, that I was here when the filibustering, as they call it, started and then skulked. Gentlemen, I never skulked. I am not made of that kind of material to skulk. If I had started in to filibuster, and had so understood it, I would have stood my ground and filibustered until the crack of doom. I did not understand this was a filibuster movement. I did not leave because I thought there was any filibustering to be done. Neither did I acknowledge that I was here until the filibustering, so-called, had started and then went out.

The gentleman—I do not know where he is from—who asked me the question whether I was not here and then left after the filibustering started was not answered by me. I wanted to answer then, but other gentlemen interrupted. You all seemed so anxious to have a victim you pitched in before I had a chance to answer. I never acknowledged to him I was here until the so-called filibustering had started, and then went out. I did not so acknowledge in my apology to the House. I stated in my apology rather jocularly that the "front of my offending hath this extent:" That I was here until nearly 6 o'clock; that I then felt very hungry, and I went home and got my dinner; that I had company to dinner; that I did not think there was anything of any importance going on, and therefore did not come back.

Now, I will submit to the reporters whether that is not the substance of my entire apology.

I remember very well, Mr. Speaker, in the last Congress when in the election cases a call of the House had been made, time and again my Democratic colleague [Mr. Klotz, from Pennsylvania] got up before this House, and instead of making a respectful apology began to talk in Pennsylvania Dutch. Yet the Republican House excused him. And there was a gentleman from Louisiana, I forget his name——

A MEMBER. Mr. Robertson.

Mr. BRUMM. Yes, Mr. Robertson, who made his apology in French from beginning to end. Yet you thought it rare sport that the Pennsylvania Dutch and French should be brought in here to account for their contempt of this House.

What is it I have done you are so anxious to punish me for and make me a catspaw in this case? Let me ask you, and especially those who were here before this session, which of you is guiltless so far as my offense is concerned? If there be any, let him cast the first stone.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I think with the explanation made that my friend from Indiana should withdraw his motion.

Mr. BRUMM. I would like to make a further remark.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that while I have no objection to the withdrawal of any motion——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has not proposed to withdraw his motion. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is still entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. The gentleman from Pennsylvania yielded to me to ask him a question. He has permitted me to interrupt him. After the statement which he has made, and which I must confess that I did not understand before, I hope my friend from Indiana will withdraw the motion. My impression had been before that the gentleman from Pennsylvania left during these proceedings.

Mr. GIBSON. I only desire to say the gentleman from New York made a speech here that gentlemen on our side desire to respond to.

The SPEAKER. That matter is not now before the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has three minutes remaining.

Mr. BRUMM. I yield a part of my time to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. STORM. Before my colleague yields let me ask him at what stage of the proceedings was it that he left the Hall?

Mr. BRUMM. It was when a motion was pending to adjourn. I voted in favor of the adjournment. The vote I think was declared 92 to 91.

Mr. STORM. That was the first motion to adjourn.

Mr. BRUMM. Yes, sir; I do not know what motion, if any, was pending at the exact time I left.* But right here permit me to say that I had a wrong impression of this bill. I was under the impression at first that this bill included Jeff. Davis in its provisions, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] told me no, it would not, and showed me the clause which would exclude him. That was sufficient to satisfy me. I said then that I had no special interest in the bill, and my vote was only in favor of adjournment, and could do no harm under the circumstances. I say this because gentlemen were present who know of this opinion which I entertained. Mr. PETTIBONE was near me.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I know that to be the fact.

Mr. BRUMM. As I understood the bill—I had not read it, but that was the opinion I first entertained—I do not know whether I should vote for it or against it.

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute.

Mr. HUNT. Mr. Speaker, can I address the House without being confined to one minute?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman addresses the House now it is in the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The Chair will next recognize the gentleman from Texas, in accordance with the practice that prevails in this House of recognizing gentlemen in the order in which they apply for recognition.

Mr. HUNT. I desire to say two or three things here to-night, and I hope that I will be allowed a few minutes longer than the time accorded me by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in which I may be heard.

In the first place, permit me to say that I am opposed to fining the gentleman who has just addressed the House. Whether or not the House has a right to fine him is a question that I will not now undertake to argue. That question has been alluded to, and the gentleman from Ohio has addressed the Chair with reference to it. But, Mr. Speaker, to leave that question. The gentleman now at the bar has excused himself before the House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. HUNT. I hope the gentleman from Texas will yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. REAGAN. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. HUNT. Mr. Speaker, I say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania excused himself to the House. He has stated that he apologized to the House, and I think, in view of the indulgence which has been shown to other gentlemen, it is only reasonable, kind, and proper in the House to excuse the gentleman.

But now, sir, I wish to say a word or two more upon another subject. This being the matter under consideration (to which I have just alluded), the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] has taken occasion to address to this House one of the most violent and partisan harangues that I have ever listened to. During the course of that harangue he saw proper to impute to the leader on the floor, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, expressions in regard to certain members of the House who are absent in language so offensive that he has drawn from the gentleman from Illinois repeated denials. But notwithstanding these repeated denials, and the positive assertions that the gentleman misstated the expression of the gentleman from Illinois, the gentleman from New York has returned again and again to this offensive language and repeated it. Is this the ground upon which you intend to put a great party? Is this the ground upon which you mean to stand, to attribute to a distinguished gentleman in an eminent position language that he never used in the face of his positive disclaimers repeated again and again upon the floor? I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from New York, notwithstanding the disclaimer, has reiterated his assertions and built upon them an argument unjust, unwise, and untrue.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me say to the gentleman——

Mr. HUNT. I do not yield. I decline to yield, and I will not be interrupted. I decline the interruption of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. Speaker, what have we seen here to-night? A gentleman taking a position equally untrue, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], who has exhibited here talents which I have frequently admired. I say we find this gentleman coming before the House and saying that they, that his party of Republicans, offered the House rules by which the majority of the House could govern it. They did no such thing. Assertion does not constitute truth. I myself voted for the proposed change in the rules referred to by the gentleman from Maine, and many more gentlemen on this side of the House—I speak according to the facts—voted for the change. Now, having made this assertion, unwarranted by the record, untrue as a matter of history, and unjust and arrogant in the extreme, the gentleman turned upon this side of the House and roared, "You did not dare to trust yourselves;" saying, I insist, that which is unjust and unfair, because it is contradicted by the RECORD. I repeat, the gentleman from Maine turned upon the House with a degree of arrogance I have seldom seen equaled, shook his finger over the House, and asked them how they liked the exhibition!

> There are a sort of men, whose visages
> Do cream and mantle, like a standing pond;
> And do a willful stillness entertain,
> With purpose to be dress'd in an opinion
> Of wisdom, gravity, profound conceit;
> As who should say, I am Sir Oracle,
> And when I ope my lips, let no dog bark!

[Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that assertions which are unwarranted, partisan zeal and inflamed talk not resting upon facts, give any superiority whatever to those who use them. They, on the contrary, only expose them to the just condemnation of right-thinking men.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUNT. One word more.

Mr. REAGAN. I must now resume the floor.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio can not take a gentleman off the floor for the purpose of making a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman has surrendered the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana has surrendered the floor to the gentleman from Texas, who yielded it to him. A gentleman can interrupt another gentleman on the floor for the purpose of making a point of order, but not for the purpose of making a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then as a point of order I insist that the discussion be confined to the question before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided again and again that the question must be confined to the question under debate. Of course the Chair can not undertake to prescribe what gentlemen shall say in their arguments. He can only determine when gentlemen are transgressing the rules of the House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Before the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] proceeds I move that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] be allowed to take his seat while this debate is proceeding.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman has the right to take a seat.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. He is at the bar of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] can resume his seat if he desires.

Mr. REAGAN. I think it is much to be regretted that there should have been so much manifestation of feeling on this occasion. It seemed to be understood when the gentleman from Pennsylvania was first brought to the bar of the House that he was here in his seat and participated in the early disturbance of the proceedings of the House to-night by filibustering; and if that had been his case it would have been different from that of any gentleman who has been brought before the bar of the House this evening, and might very justly have been differently treated. But inasmuch as he has declared he was not present, I do not see there is a material difference between his position and the position of other gentlemen who have been brought to the bar of the House this evening.

I must confess, Mr. Speaker, to some degree of astonishment at the arraignment of the House by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] who first addressed the Chair on this subject. Solemn and repeated asseverations were made of the disorderly and disreputable action of the House of Representatives, and that was made the basis for charging that disorder upon the Democratic side of the House. The Democratic side of the House was simply attempting to get a resolution passed, if it could, authorizing the consideration of a bill to which much importance was attached by members of the House and in which many of the people of this country are deeply interested; old, decrepit, worn-out men, men who bore the banners of this country in a foreign land and won territory equal to the original thirteen States in size, now peopled by more of the American people than were in the Colonies during the Revolutionary war.

Sir, it was while we were seeking to get this bill before the House that the gentleman and his friends chose, rather than let these time-worn and scarred veterans have a hearing before the House—chose, in the face of the rule of the House which requires each member to vote on all propositions submitted if he is not excused—chose to avail themselves of an irregular, revolutionary method of defeating the action of the House by refusing to vote. The excuse offered to the House for this was that the Democrats had acted in a like manner on former occasions.

It would be perhaps almost idle to speak to those who have witnessed the proceedings of the House during the last eight years on the subject of this filibustering. But it is fair to say, it is just to say, it is true to say, that whenever the Republicans have been in the minority they have resorted to this, continually almost, to a degree in which it was not resorted to by any other party, either Democratic or any other, in the history of this Government for the purpose of defeating the will of the people and of defeating legislation. And if the Democratic party had been doing wrong, it was hardly to have been expected that a learned and distinguished gentleman should say that his party had a right to do wrong because some other party had done wrong, and that, sir, in the face of the facts that have occurred to-night, where all this confusion, delay, and excitement have been produced by that gentleman and his associates in attempting to resist the lawful action of this House in setting a day to consider an important public bill; not to pass it, to set a time for examination, for amendment, for discussion, that it might be matured; if it had bad features, that they might be stricken out; if it lacked important features, that they might be placed in it, for the purpose of giving a fair discussion and consideration and having fair action on this measure.

And then the gentleman from Indiana was re-enforced by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], who, with a violence of manner altogether uncalled-for by the occasion and an exhibition of mock heroics, moved up and down the area in front of the Speaker in a way that I take it when he gets cool he will not consider to have been a seemly and proper parliamentary exhibition.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman allow me a question there?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to ask the gentleman if he did not unite with the Democratic minority of the last Congress to resist the amendment of the rules which governed this House so as to prevent filibustering and raising the question of no quorum?

Mr. REAGAN. I think the gentleman is mistaken, for I have been in favor of the rules proposed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], and have voted for them whenever I had the opportunity.

Mr. HORR. The gentleman from New York alluded to the rule in reference to bringing election cases to a decision.

Mr. REAGAN. In that case the rules of the House had been arbitrarily violated by the gentleman who occupied the place which you, Mr. Speaker, now occupy, to seat one not elected to a position in this House upon forged and fraudulent papers and to deprive one justly elected of his seat. In view of this violence, contemplating wrong, I would have filibustered until the crack of doom rather than submit to this violation of the rules, this outrage, this wrong. [Applause.]

Sir, I would have thought that the gentleman would not have wished to call that case back to memory—a case in which it appeared upon this floor that forged and fraudulent papers were being used, the character of which was not discovered until the trial had begun, and when the contestee was denied the privilege of answering them or of producing the evidence to prove the forgery and fraud.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] permit me a moment?

Mr. REAGAN. Not to submit an argument.

Mr. REED. A question of fact which I wish to call to the memory of the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman from Texas says that he does not remember whether he declined to vote.

Mr. REAGAN. I say I did not decline to vote; that I voted.

Mr. REED. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that if he will examine the matter he will find that he is now mistaken, that he sat silent as we have sat to-night.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman is exceedingly smart and sharp.

Mr. REED. It is not a question of sharpness.

Mr. REAGAN. For a man of his size and weight he is considerably sharp. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. It is not a question of smartness; it is a question of fact.

Mr. REAGAN. I know that I resisted that wrong by all the means that I could use. Such a parliamentary fraud has never been exhibited for the last two hundred years in any country having parliamentary law to govern it—in any country that I know of. But that is aside from what I expected to say.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] arose and arraigned this side of the House for being unable to control the action of the House, for being unable to pass bills. He arraigned members of this side of the House who happened to be absent to-night because they doubtless did not know that such an affair as this was to have come up. It will be remembered that this disturbance arose after the usual hour of adjournment, when I have no doubt many members had gone to their homes for their dinners. Some of them have been brought back here; others have not been found. But at any rate the line of argument used by the gentleman from New York is not fair, to assume that they were absent willfully and purposely to avoid participation in the proceedings of this night. I take it for granted that if they had anticipated such a condition of things there would have been enough of them here to have made a quorum and to have prevented the disgraceful scenes which have been enacted here to-night.

In reply to the first gentleman who spoke upon this matter, and to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] who three times repeated that we did not know how to manage our business, and to the last gentleman who spoke, all of them taunting us about our inability with a large majority to control the action of this House, I will say that I trust that those taunts and those challenges will be sufficient to arouse a patriotic devotion to duty and principle that will enable the Democratic members of this House hereafter to be present in their places and to control the proceedings of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But for the fact that these Republican tactics have been resorted to, tactics always exhibited when they are in a minority here, and that they count as an element of their strength on the vacillation and the want of endurance of those on this side of the House, I would have been willing to have abandoned this struggle before now. But while I am less able than many to remain here to-night by reason of afflictions that unfit me for it, I say to you that rather than permit them to dictate our policy in a manner so unjust in reference to a measure so important as this, I would stay here, sleeping or waking, without adjournment until final action is had, if it shall take until the fourth of next July. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And unless we mean to do that, unless we have the courage to use the strength and power given to us, we are unworthy of the position that we fill here, and might as well surrender the control of legislation in this body.

I say to our friends here that if these taunts, if these insults, if this audacity hurled into their faces will not bring our Democratic friends to a sense of duty and a respect for themselves and their rights and the rights of the people they represent, I do not know what will do it. I hope they will stand by the right, and teach our Republican friends on the other side that they will have a lively time from this time on in endeavoring to prevent legislation by filibustering. [Renewed applause.]

If we were proposing to overthrow the Constitution, to violate the rules of this House, as was the case to which the gentleman from New York called your attention, when his party was trying for partisan purposes to overthrow, and did overthrow, the rules of the House—if such a thing as that was being done by the Democratic party, I should not blame the Republicans for resisting by all the means they could avail themselves of. But when we are simply proceeding quietly and orderly with legitimate legislation, to which there is no constitutional objection, merely trying to obtain a hearing upon a bill that for now the third or fourth time has been reported favorably from the Committee on Pensions, reported by consent of members of both parties, once before unanimously and now again——

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The section of this bill criticised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] passed the House of the Forty-fourth Congress without a dissenting voice.

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HORR. You admit that there are cases where a man has a right to filibuster.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not believe that there is any such right. I have always believed that when a member refused to vote under the rules of the House which required him to vote on a question coming before the House for action, unless he is excused, he puts himself in contempt of the House. But you can not enforce the rule, simply because the minority may withhold their votes and defeat the effort of the majority to enforce the rules. Such a course is a violation of rule, a violation of right; but thus far no parliamentary means has been found to prevent or punish it.

Mr. HORR. The gentleman did not fully answer my question. He admits that his party did as we are doing. Now the question is, whether we have the right to decide in our own minds when it is our right and duty to pursue this course or whether we shall permit gentlemen on the other side to decide that for us.

Mr. GIBSON. The gentleman from Michigan said the other day that some of us had not the right to decide these questions for ourselves.

Mr. HORR. The gentleman from Texas understands my question.

Mr. REAGAN. Of course no member of the House and no party will assume the right to judge for another member or for another party. Members and parties judge upon their own responsibility as to the propriety of their own action. What I said before was that if an attempt was being made to violate the Constitution or to overthrow the rules of the House, that proceeding, being itself revolutionary, might be met by the revolutionary proceeding of refusing to vote. But never have I given my consent that it was a legitimate or proper method of meeting legitimate legislation to which there was no constitutional objection and where there was no element of wrong entering into it.

Mr. STEELE. I know the gentleman from Texas does not wish to misrepresent the position of the committee on this question. Therefore he will allow me to state that in the committee I and one other member voted against reporting this bill favorably.

Mr. REAGAN. I accept the correction of the gentleman. I was induced to make my statement because a member of the committee had so stated, no doubt through inadvertence. Of course the gentleman from Indiana knows what occurred in the committee.

Mr. BELFORD. I would like to ask my friend from Texas a question.

Mr. REAGAN. I beg pardon; the gentleman from Colorado has put his oar in several times to-night and he ought to be satisfied.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas declines to yield.

Mr. REAGAN. All the gentlemen on the other side have based their failure to vote, their engaging in revolutionary proceedings, upon the distinct ground—gentlemen on the other side smile because I call it "revolutionary," but if they will study the case they will find I am not mistaken in giving it that name—they base their revolutionary action upon the fact that others have done the like, that Democrats have done the same thing. No one of them has attempted otherwise to justify his course, except in what was said by the gentleman from New York, who read and arraigned the provisions of the bill, as if we were acting upon its provisions at this time, ignoring the fact that what we are now simply seeking an opportunity to bring the bill before the House, where it may be debated, where it may be amended, where it may be perfected, where it may be enacted into a law if the House should so judge or if the majority should so choose, where it may be defeated.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my custom to criticise on this floor the political action of parties. I have made it a rule, as a general thing, to address myself to an entirely different class of questions. However others may enjoy the arraignment or assailment of their adversaries, right or wrong, reasonably or unreasonably, I have not much taste for such discussion, and I would not have made these remarks now but for the fact that it seemed to me gentlemen have assumed oracular airs and arraigned the action of the House as if they were not the guilty parties in what was going on—have assumed that they represent the patriotism, the integrity, the honor, and the honesty of this country; as if they were not responsible for outrages that have been perpetrated upon this country through years past in legislation only to be thought of in order to be shunned.

Mr. McCOID. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is it not true that when this matter began this evening, or rather last evening, the usual hour of adjournment had passed; that a motion to adjourn had been voted for by almost a majority, I believe, on the other side of the House; and it was only when members generally understood that it was the Mexican pension bill which was at issue that the other side of the House rallied with determination to put the resolution through that night? Was it not an arbitrary determination at that hour? And did not this arouse the opposition that occurred? I think it did.

Mr. REAGAN. I will reply to the gentleman that about the usual hour for adjournment the chairman of the Committee on Pensions made a motion which looked to securing the action recommended by his committee on this bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. On that proposition the committee was unanimous.

Mr. REAGAN. In accordance with a unanimous recommendation of the committee, the gentleman from Alabama sought to have passed a resolution which would secure action upon a bill agreed to by the committee. If the resolution should fail to be acted upon during this legislative day the bill must either go to the Calendar, there to sleep the eternal sleep, or the matter must pass over until the third Monday of next month before the motion can be again made.

The gentleman from Iowa and all others understand why anxiety should have been manifested to put that resolution through at this time—not a resolution to pass the bill, but simply to fix a day for its consideration. And, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman and his partisans had consented to let the proceedings of the House go on and votes to be taken without resorting to the process of filibustering, we would have acted on that resolution and would have adjourned the House by half past 6 o'clock. But as soon as gentlemen on the other side saw that the purpose was to bring the bill before the House for consideration, the process of delay, of the calling of yeas and nays, the calls for divisions, and refusing to vote, commenced and have gone on up to the present time, 3 o'clock in the morning.

I beg pardon for having occupied the floor so long. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LAMB].

Mr. LAMB. I yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WELLER. I am sick and have been brought here, and I want to be excused and permitted to go home.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not unless by unanimous consent interrupt this proceeding.

Mr. MORRISON. I am obliged to the gentleman from Indiana for his courtesy.

Mr. BAYNE. Let us have order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is endeavoring to secure order. Gentlemen will resume their seats and cease conversation.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I said I was obliged to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LAMB] for his courtesy while I correct the statements of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] in reference to me, and which he seemed unwilling to correct. I neither desire to complain nor to answer his violent tirade when he was speaking in front of the Speaker's or Clerk's desk. He said in a somewhat violent manner, Why do you not punish your own absent members? Why do you seek out this gentleman from Pennsylvania and make him the victim? My reply was that the Democratic members who were absent had not been here during these proceedings since the call of the House began and had not skulked away in contempt of the House and its proceedings. By that reply I of course meant by implication to say that the gentleman from Pensylvania had skulked away in contempt of the proceedings of the House. I said so because I then believed, from what the gentleman had said himself, he had, after the call of the House and in violation of its order, gone away from the proceedings and in contempt of what was going on here. Afterward, on further explanation, I came to learn from the gentleman's statement that I had misapprehended the facts, and that he had not gone away in contempt of the proceedings of the House. Therefore it is, Mr. Speaker, I want to say I wronged him in making that statement. [Applause.]

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will yield to me a moment.

Mr. LAMB. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] knows full well that there is no gentleman on this floor I respect more than I do him. I believe since I have been a member of this House his relations and mine have been friendly; more than that, they have been cordial.

I can only say in answer to what he said it is barely possible in the heat and excitement of the moment—and I think you will bear me witness, Mr. Speaker, that at the time I was subjected to a great many interruptions—it is barely possible I misunderstood the statement he made. I certainly accept the statement he has now made as the one he made on that occasion.

Mr. LAMB. Oil seems to have been poured on the troubled waters, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] is now as peaceful as a while ago he was boisterous. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] had made the statement at the time he was brought in that he has now made there would have been no motion made to fine him. As the House has waked to a sense of its duty to the business of the House I ask permission to withdraw my motion. [Applause.] I move he be discharged.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to excuse Mr. BRUMM.

The motion was agreed to; and then Mr. BRUMM was excused.

Mr. BURNES. I beg to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the wife of a member is being detained unnecessarily because of this debate. I therefore ask the unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. O'HARA, have leave of absence for one hour to escort his wife home.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the gentleman from North Carolina will be permitted to have leave of absence for one hour.

There was no objection.

Mr. GUENTHER. I move that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] be excused for to-night on account of sickness.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state further that I made a pair with Hon. Mr. KASSON, of Iowa, before I left; and supposed and understood, in fact, that it excused me. I was at home and sick with pneumonia when I received notice to attend the House. I am unable to remain any longer.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. WELLER was excused.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody, in obedience to its order, Mr. CURTIN, Mr. FINERTY, Mr. BUDD, Mr. MITCHELL, and Mr. GLASCOCK.

The SPEAKER. Mr. CURTIN, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Speaker, after the vote was taken to adjourn, and desiring to get home because I had engagements there, I paired with Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, and left the Hall and went to my residence. At that time I was not aware that any great necessity required my presence in this House. I must confess, therefore, to my amazement when I came in the door in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms and found the gentleman from New York there occupying the floor, waltzing up and down in the area here, and the gentleman from the Rocky Mountains, full of fire and vim, standing in his rear, and the House in a state of seeming confusion and violence which I must confess I did not expect. Mr. Speaker, if I had supposed there was to be an exhibition of so much violence and so much temper I think I should have remained away or attempted to escape from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

That is all, Mr. Speaker. I meant no disrespect to the House.

Mr. OCHILTREE. Did you leave the House before the filibustering began?

Mr. CURTIN. I left before any exhibition of the kind which has just enlightened the House took place. I left before I saw anything like this exhibition or heard any of the abuse of a great political party.

I have stated that I did not know there was anything of the kind going on. I am opposed to all violence, and I confess that I do not like abuse at any time; but when I came into this House, when I entered that door, I found that the majority of this House was being subjected by the gentleman from New York who had the floor to a vast amount of personal vituperation and abuse. I am not disposed to accept that kind of abuse myself, and if a gentleman wants to abuse me at any time I will take it from him with great kindness, but I will return it blow for blow. [Laughter and applause.] Now, if it is the wish of the House to fine me I will pay it.

Mr. COOK. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIN. It cost me nothing. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. Mr. FINERTY, you also have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. FINERTY. I left the House, Mr. Speaker, under the belief that it had settled down to the regular habit of adjourning at 5 o'clock. I left before there was any notice or indication of the proceedings that have enlivened the House to-night. I left, of course, without the intention of violating the rules of the House or in any way running contrary to the wishes of its members. I have no other excuse, sir, to make. I came when I was called on, at a very unseemly hour, out of my bed to this House, having braved the midnight air, or rather, I should say, the early morning air, for the purpose of obeying the summons; and I think, to speak truthfully, that it is sufficient punishment to be driven through this damp atmosphere for a couple of miles. And having come in obedience to the call, I submit myself to the action of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BUDD, you have also been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BUDD. I have been ill for about a month, and left the House on account of illness. I wish to state, though, that had I known that a bill to pension the Mexican war veterans would come up at the evening session or at any other time I would have staid here, although they carried my body to California at a large expense of cocktails, as they did in Garfield's case.

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. MITCHELL, you have also been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. MITCHELL. I left the House at 5 o'clock after the yea-and-nay vote, supposing the House was about to adjourn. Had I known that there was any probability of such a session I should have remained here.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. GLASCOCK, you have also been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. GLASCOCK. I have no other excuse to offer than that which has been offered by the three gentlemen who preceeded me. I left the House about a quarter to 5 o'clock, under the impression that the House would adjourn at the regular time. I knew of no proceedings then pending which would consume the time of the House, and had no idea that we would go into a night session until I was aroused by the Sergeant-at-Arms. I have no excuse to render. No man under the circumstances has any, and I await the action of the House.

Mr. HENLEY. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BELFORD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, the Speaker stated that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion to test the condition of the House, whether there is a quorum.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 57, nays 143, not voting 120; as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

After the second roll-call the following proceedings occurred:

Mr. NICHOLLS. I am paired with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCORMICK]. As this seems to be regarded as a political question, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CALKINS. I am paired with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and withdraw my vote.

Mr. CRISP. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS], being under arrest, is, strictly speaking, not here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware that the gentleman from Indiana is under the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. CRISP. But that is the fact.

The SPEAKER. At any rate, the gentleman from Indiana withdraws his vote.

Mr. TALBOTT. I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HARMER]. The understanding was that either of us might vote to make a quorum. I have therefore voted.

Mr. CURTIN. I should like the Clerk to read the pairs to show how long my pair lasts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report all the pairs not already reported during the day.

Mr. ARNOT. I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. The rules of the House are very imperative that a gentleman can not vote after the second roll-call. It has been the custom, however, to allow a gentleman to vote when he states he was in his seat giving attention but failed to hear his name called. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. ARNOT] make that statement?

Mr. ARNOT. I do, sir.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman from New York will be permitted to vote.

There was no objection.

Mr. ARNOT. I vote "no."

Mr. HOUK. I am paired with Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, and desire to withdraw my vote.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. HISCOCK with Mr. WASHBURN.

Mr. HISCOCK. I voted, not supposing that my vote was involved in that pair. But I now withdraw it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, with Mr. THOMPSON.

Mr. WELLBORN with Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. MCCORMICK.

Mr. RICE with Mr. CURTIN, for this evening.

Mr. CURTIN. Do the words "this evening" imply that the pair is to be regarded as still continuing?

The SPEAKER. That is scarcely a question for the Chair to decide. The Chair supposes, however, that the words mean the pair extends during the legislative day.

Mr. CURTIN. Then I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MOREY. There has been some mistake about arranging pairs. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCORMICK] is paired with two gentlemen. I withdraw my vote, and pair myself with Mr. BLOUNT, of Georgia.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in his custody Mr. CALKINS, of Indiana, and Mr. LACEY, of Michigan.

The SPEAKER. Mr. CALKINS, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. CALKINS. Before this affray began I had at the suggestion of my good friend Governor THROCKMORTON paired with one of his colleagues from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and had gone home. The reason I yielded so readily was that some time ago we were engaged in some little unpleasantness together and I did not want the gentleman to harbor any feelings of discord or disharmony with any of us who were against him, and on his suggestion I paired with him and went home. If I had known my comrades desired my presence I should have been here long ago. The moment the messenger was sent and I received word it was desirable that I should be here, with all due haste as fast as horses could bring me I came and I am here to stay the balance of the time.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move that Mr. CALKINS be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. LACEY, you also have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. LACEY. The usual hour of adjournment having arrived and there being a motion to adjourn pending, I left the House supposing that it would then adjourn. As soon as I received an invitation to return here I immediately came and am here, and ask to be excused for non-attendance.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes a. m). As most of the members here seem to be asleep, I think perhaps we can carry a motion that I wish to make. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 34, noes 66.

The Sergeant-at-Arms (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes a. m.) appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody Mr. CASSIDY, Mr. CLARDY, and Mr. CARLETON.

The SPEAKER. Mr. CASSIDY, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. CASSIDY. I left last evening at the usual hour of adjournment, a motion to adjourn pending, and supposed everybody was going to vote for it. I should have been very happy to have joined you here if I had known that gentlemen intended to remain.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CASSIDY. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. It is whether he has now come here at the earliest moment that he knew the House was in session? Two hundred members have been kept here all night, many of them absent from sick families.

Mr. CASSIDY. This is the first notice I have had that the House was in session.

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to, upon a division—ayes 42, noes 4.

The SPEAKER. Mr. CLARDY, you also have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. CLARDY. I left about 5 o'clock last evening, thinking the House was about to adjourn. About 9 o'clock, perhaps earlier, I learned that the House was in session. I came up here and found I could not effect an entrance unless supported by the Sergeant-at-Arms. I remained here perhaps an hour and then went to my hotel and have been there ever since.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that my colleague be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. CARLETON, you also have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. CARLETON. My excuse is the same as that given by the gentleman before me; I did not know that the House was in session.

Mr. ARNOT. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS (at 5.30 a. m.). I submit the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the leaves of absence heretofore granted members of this House for the present legislative day be, and they are hereby, revoked, and the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby instructed to notify them of this action of this House and to request their immediate attendance.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution which has been read by the Clerk.

Mr. REED. That is a proposition to revoke leaves of absence given on account of sickness. Does the House intend to do that?

Mr. MORRISON. That is just what we are going to do.

Mr. REED. You are getting pretty desperate.

Mr. GIBSON. All those sick men have got well by this time.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask a vote on my resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] is on the floor.

Mr. REED. I think I have made about all the observations on this matter that occur to me now.

The question was taken on adopting the resolution offered by Mr. WILLIS; and upon a division, there were—ayes 59, noes 22.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. REED said: I make the point of order that no quorum has voted on this question.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any suggestion to make on the point of order?

Mr. REED. The suggestion I make is that this proposition is in the nature of business and not in pursuance of a call of the House. It is a proposition to revoke and annul certain business which has been transacted by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this is a proceeding to secure the attendance of absent members in order to make a quorum for the transaction of business by the House.

Mr. MORRISON. The same House that excuses the gentlemen can bring them back.

The SPEAKER. Less than a quorum may decide all questions of that character.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Allow me to make a suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It is that this resolution simply requests those members to be present here; it does not order their arrest.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is there any evidence before the Speaker that less than a quorum granted these leaves of absence?

The SPEAKER. The Chair, of course, could decide that question by an inspection of the Journal.

Mr. REED. There is no doubt that some of them were excused by a quorum.

Mr. HISCOCK. The question of a quorum upon the excuse was never raised.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair thinks that the House must possess the inherent power to preserve its capacity for legislation. When it finds itself without a quorum it can require the attendance of absent members.

Mr. REED. As this is a novel question, allow me to make a suggestion to the Speaker. Suppose that there being no question of a quorum the House granted leave of absence to a member for five or six days. We know the object of obtaining leave of absence is that the member shall not be sent for by the Sergeant-at-Arms. Now, can the House with less than a quorum revoke and reverse the action of a full House and send for that member? I have no doubt that on inspection it will be found that some of those who are absent by leave of the House were excused by the House before this contest began.

Mr. GIBSON. Every vote taken to-night has shown the absence of a quorum. The whole delay has arisen on account of that fact.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read from clause 2 of Rule XV:

The Clerk read as follows:

In the absence of a quorum fifteen members, including the Speaker, if there is one, shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members; and in all calls of the House the names of the members shall be called by the Clerk and the absentees noted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will also read a provision of the Constitution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner, and under such penalties as each House may provide.

Mr. REED. Those penalties and those methods must be previously prescribed by the House—the full House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that the constitutional provision is simply that less than a quorum may be authorized to compel the attendance of members, and the rule which has just been read does authorize less than a quorum to compel such attendance.

Mr. CALKINS. But, Mr. Speaker, that presupposes the House has taken no action in the way of excusing members. The true application of the rule and the constitutional provision, as construed together, is that the power of the House is a power to compel the attendance of absent members, where there has been no prior action on the part of the House authorizing the members to be absent. For example, a resolution might be introduced granting leave of absence for a definite number of days to some member. That resolution might be adopted by a yea-and-nay vote, and afterward, I submit, nothing less than the House could revoke such action.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman will see at once that the House by such a proceeding might disable itself entirely for the transaction of business, and when the House finds itself in that condition it must of course resort to its constitutional authority to compel the presence of absentees.

Mr. CALKINS. Then the House is remitted to its constitutional right to adjourn from day to day; and when the leave which it has granted is exhausted it can compel the attendance of members. That is its only remedy.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Inasmuch as these leaves of absence were granted by less than a quorum, can they not be revoked by less than a quorum?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has just intimated that in its opinion less than a quorum can revoke these leaves of absence and request the attendance of the absentees. The Chair does not think it would be in the power of the House to issue a warrant to arrest members who had departed with its leave.

Mr. REED. Why not, if the leave could be revoked?

The SPEAKER. Because members who have departed with the leave of the House are not in default. But if, after a notification by the Sergeant-at-Arms, under the authority of the House, they should refuse to appear, then the question would be presented as to what the House might do in such case. The Chair thinks the resolution is in order. The ayes have it, and the resolution is adopted.

Mr. CALKINS (at 6 o'clock and 45 minutes a. m.). I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER (after putting the question). The noes seem to have it.

Mr. CALKINS. Let us have the yeas and nays on that.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 23, noes 51.

Mr. WILLIS. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The SPEAKER. More than one-fifth having voted in the affirmative, the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope that no unnecessary burden will be imposed on the clerks. On our side we do not ask the yeas and nays in deference to the clerks.

Mr. HOPKINS. Your side did ask for them.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope the demand for the yeas and nays will not be pressed. [Cries of "Regular order!"] I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered. The clerks have been here all night calling the roll, and I appeal to gentlemen to relieve them of any unnecessary labor.

Mr. HISCOCK. We are entirely willing to relieve them.

The motion of Mr. WILLIS to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered was agreed to, there being—ayes 65, noes 12.

The question recurring on ordering the yeas and nays, they were not ordered; there being—ayes 6, noes 46.

So the motion of Mr. CALKINS to dispense with further proceedings under the call was not agreed to.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in his custody Mr. MILLS, Mr. CULBERTSON of Kentucky, Mr. WINANS of Wisconsin, and Mr. JOHN S. WISE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], according to the recollection of the Chair, is not in default, having been excused by the House.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to say, at any rate, that I left the committee-room yesterday evening suffering with rheumatism. There was a very important hearing by the committee, but I was unable to stay till the conclusion, though I much desired to do so. This bill granting pensions to the soldiers of the Mexican war is an important measure, one in which my constituents feel a deep interest, and nothing but sickness would have kept me away from the House during its consideration. If I had not been suffering with rheumatism I would gladly have come to the House last night when I was sent for.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in default.

Mr. MILLS. Still I desired to make this statement.

The SPEAKER. Mr. CULBERTSON, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. CULBERTSON, of Kentucky. None, sir, whatever.

Mr. MORRISON, I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. WINANS of Wisconsin you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WINANS, of Wisconsin. I left the House about 5 or 5.30 o'clock, and was suffering with headache. I supposed the House was about to adjourn, and was merely anticipating it.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. JOHN S. WISE, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. When I went last evening I went with Mr. SNYDER on a pair, and we were both under the impression the House was about to adjourn in a few minutes, the House having voted 91 for and 92 against.

Mr. CALKINS. I move that the gentleman be excused

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 67, noes 5.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, eight or ten members have come in on their own volition since we had the last roll-call, and I therefore move that we have a vote to see if a quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The House is proceeding under a call of the House, and a motion to dispense with all further proceedings under it is the only motion in order.

Mr. COOK. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. COSGROVE and Mr. TURNER of Kentucky demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIS. Let us have tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky, and Mr. WILLIS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 3, noes not counted.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, if gentlemen think there is a quorum present.

The proceedings under the call were then dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on seconding the motion to suspend the rules and pass the original resolution.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, and Mr. CALKINS were appointed as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 165, noes 1.

So there was a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules thirty minutes are allowed for debate; fifteen minutes for, and fifteen minutes against. The debate for the bill will be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT], and against by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS]. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. CALKINS. I do not claim the fifteen minutes under the rules. I am in favor of the Mexican pension bill when stripped of everything but that. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] to control the time.

Mr. REED. I respectfully decline.

Mr. CALKINS. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not desire to take fifteen minutes. I have attended this all-night session, using my efforts as best I could to make a quorum at all times, although I am opposed to the bill, and for reasons which I shall not take the time of the House now to give, further than to say that I am opposed to changing the ground of pensions from disability to service. I am opposed to the bill, not because I would not vote pensions to Mexican veterans, if that were the only issue and if behind it there were not grave questions that rise above it. Mr. Speaker, I think it a serious matter for this House to propose now to change the basis of pensions from disability to that of service, as is proposed in this bill. For that reason I oppose the bill; and at some other time, when the House is in better mood to hear argument, I hope to have the opportunity to give my reasons at length. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I demand a vote upon the resolution. I waive the debate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If that bill is the bill that passed the House in the Forty-fourth Congress, I will vote for it; otherwise, otherwise.

Mr. STEELE. I ask that the resolution be reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair). Without objection, the resolution will be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That House bill No. 3962, granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war and other wars therein named, and for other purposes, be made the special order in the House as in Committee of the Whole on Thursday, the 21st of February, 1884, after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, not to interfere with general appropriation or revenue bills or reports from the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. STEELE. I move to amend by striking out——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not amendable. It could only be amended now by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEELE. Then I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is objection. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution.

Mr. REAGAN. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. DUNN. Yes, let us have the yeas and nays. There seems to be some opposition to this bill. I want to see whom it comes from.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 176, nays 35, not voting 109; as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication, with the accompanying paper, will be printed, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONGER presented a memorial of citizens of Ontonagon County, Michigan, and resolutions adopted by the board of supervisors of Ontonagon County, Michigan, remonstrating against the bill forfeiting the lands granted in aid of the construction of the Marquette, Houghton and Ontonagon Railroad; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 351) for the relief of Alexander Smiley, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. On the 19th of December, 1883, there was submitted to the Senate Executive Document No. 25, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, being a message of the President of the United States, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of War of December 14, 1883, "respecting abandoned military reservations, and renewing recommendation for such legislation as will provide for the disposal of military sites that are no longer needed," which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The Committee on Military Affairs have duly considered the same, and have instructed me to submit a report to the Senate, accompanied by a bill to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations, and recommend its passage.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1544) to amend section 5388 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to timber depredations, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1545) to amend section 5388 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to timber depredations, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported the following bills:

A bill (S. 1582) to provide for the settlement of the estates of deceased Kickapoo Indians in the State of Kansas, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 1583) to accept and ratify an agreement made by the Pah-Ute Indians, and granting a right of way to the Carson and Colorado Railroad Company through the Walker River reservation in Nevada.

The bills were severally read twice by their titles, and, on motion of Mr. DAWES, recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them adversely; and they were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 782) for the relief of Eunice Tripler, widow of Charles S. Tripler, late a surgeon in the United States Army;

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 654) to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic, to report it back and to ask that the Committee on Finance be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. I will state that this bill, in the early part of the session, and several petitions on the same subject, were referred to the Committee on Finance, but since that time all bills and petitions relating to the subject have been referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I also report back certain petitions to the same effect and ask that the Committee on Finance be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 961) to provide for paying certain advances made to the United States by the States of Maryland and Virginia, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 7) to authorize the payment of customs duties in legal-tender notes, to report it adversely. I ask that it be placed on the Calendar, as the Senator originating it [Mr. BECK] desires that it may go on the Calendar,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them adversely; and they were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 73) for the retirement of small legal-tender notes;

A bill (S. 619) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make final adjustment of claims of certain foreign steamship companies arising from the illegal exaction of tonnage duties; and

A bill (S. 795) to adjust certain accounts between the United States and the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia.

Mr. GROOME subsequently said: A few minutes since an adverse report was made upon the bill (S. 750) granting a pension to Catharine Schools, and the bill was indefinitely postponed. I move that that postponement be reconsidered, with a view to the bill being placed on the Calendar with the adverse report.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Millitary Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 557) for the relief of John A. Hart, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAMPTON. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1311) vacating all that portion of the Fort Randall military reservation in the Territory of Dakota lying east of the Missouri River, to report it adversely, the committee having reported a general bill upon the subject of military reservations.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BECK. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 806) for the relief of John McNellis, to report it adversely. There is an accompanying report. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. SLATER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 510) for the relief of B. Jennings, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HARRISON. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, asking for an extension of signal-service facilities on the Pacific coast, to report it back and to say that the committee have addressed the Secretary of War upon the subject, and from his response believe that there is a lack of facilities as complained of by the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, but the lack of facilities grows out of the lack of money, and as it has become a question of appropriation, the committee have instructed me to report back the memorial with the letter of the Secretary of War and move that they be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom the following bills were referred, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

PRINTING OF EDUCATIONAL STATEMENTS.

Mr. BLAIR. I report by direction of the Committee on Education and Labor the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the usual number of copies of the statements and testimony of the committee of State superintendents of public instruction at the joint hearing had on the 16th instant before the Committee of the Senate on Education and Labor and the House Committee on Education upon the subject of national aid to common schools be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are these copies of documents sent to Congress from any Executive Department?

Mr. BLAIR. No, they are addresses and statements of fact made by the committee of superintendents before the Committee on Education and Labor of the Senate and the Committee on Education of the House, and as the matter is valuable, both committees desire that it shall be printed for use.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is under the impression that under the rule such a resolution will have to go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection to its going there, if that is thought to be necessary. I consulted with the chairman of the Committee on Printing, and it was his impression that there was no occasion for its reference, it being for the printing of the usual number of copies and a resolution reported by direction of a committee.

Mr. GARLAND. Let the resolution be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that under the first section of Rule XXIX it is competent for the Senate to make the order now. The Chair at first thought it would fall under the head of additional numbers, as these are not executive documents, but the first section of the rule provides for the printing of other papers, &c. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears no objection. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A. H. VON LUETTWITZ.

Mr. INGALLS. Some days since the Committee on Military Affairs reported adversely upon the bill (S. 556) for the relief of A. H. Von Luettwitz, and it was indefinitely postponed. The period of parliamentary reconsideration has passed, but I ask unanimous consent that the action of the Senate may be reconsidered and the bill placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the vote of the Senate postponing indefinitely the bill named by him be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection. It is reconsidered; and the bill, with the adverse report of the committee, will be placed on the Calendar.

UNIVERSITY OF ALABAMA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no further "concurrent or other resolutions," the Calendar of cases under the eighth rule of the Senate will be taken up, commencing with Order of Business No. 79, being the bill (S. 503) to increase the endowment of the University of Alabama from the public lands in said State.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALLY MALLORY.

The consideration of the bill (S. 1056) granting an increase of pension to Sally Mallory was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. Upon the passage of that bill I shall ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, I desire to say only a few words in regard to this matter. I was a little surprised at the objection made yesterday by my friend the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], as well as by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. I could see nothing in this case, neither could the Committee on Pensions, who have reported the bill, to make a precedent which would be alarming in its nature or injurious in its draft upon the Treasury. This is a case such as has not been presented within my term of service, and probably not in that of many members of this body, no matter how far back the date of their service may go.

The committee have reported the bill giving to Sally Mallory, the widow of Benajah Mallory, $30 per month, and my friend desires to know why it is that it is proposed to increase her pension. He desires to know the foundation of the claim, and that is a very proper inquiry. The report briefly states the facts; and superadded thereto it is not improper for me to state that this is an extraordinary case, one calling for the bounty and the generosity of this Government.

The Senator from Connecticut says that if we increase the pension of this widow there are hundreds of other widows whose pensions will have to be increased. Precisely the same argument would have applied with greater force when we proposed to pension and did pension the widows of Presidents of the United States. It would apply with greater force when the proposition is made to pension at $50 per month the widows of officers of high rank in the Army and the Navy. I will say to my friend from Missouri that upon one day last session, when we voted a pension of $5,000 a year each to three widows of Presidents of the United States, there was not a murmur of disapproval anywhere within this Chamber; I think there was no call of the yeas and nays, and my impression is that not a single vote was recorded or word uttered against the passage of that measure. I would say to my friend further that giving such a pension to only one widow of a dead President, if she lives to the ordinary time allotted she will have received more than would be taken from the Treasury if to-day we should pension every widow of a soldier of the Revolutionary war at the rate here proposed. Yet that measure excited no comment, no displeasure, no disapprobation.

There are a few remaining of these persons, and every year the number is fewer still. To-day this poor woman is asking for this bounty because she has outlived all her natural relatives. During the last few years she has been mainly supported by an adopted son, who toiled day by day to gain subsistence for himself and this widowed mother, until past seventy years, nearly eighty, he himself has become disabled to furnish support for her by the labor of his hands.

The Senator from Missouri asks, "Why do this thing? What is there unusual in it?" I will say to my friend what there is unusual in it. This aged woman to-day has three patents of American nobility, if the gentleman will excuse that expression; one by reason of the services of her husband in the Revolutionary war, where he served three years and six months; another by reason of his service in the war of 1812——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Senator from Nebraska will suspend. The rule under which the Senate is now proceeding limits the debate upon a question on the part of each Senator to five minutes. Is there objection to the Senator proceeding? ["Go on!"] The Chair hears none. The Senator from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I say she has a second patent by reason of the services of her husband in the war of 1812——

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. When was she married to this soldier?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I do not remember the date of her marriage. I do not know that I have it anywhere. I did not suppose it important to investigate that fact, because I did not dream for a moment that an aged woman, nearly a hundred years old, the widow of a Revolutionary soldier, would ever be catechised as to the date of her wedding and where her marriage certificate was filed. I can not give the information on that particular point. But I was saying that she had a second patent of nobility in the fact that she was wedded to a man who was a hero in two wars—first, in the war of the Revolution, and then during the whole of the war of 1812, a brave and gallant soldier under Scott at Lundy's Lane, where his horse was shot from under him. Then she has a third patent of nobility in the fact that she lives to-day the widow of a hero of two wars.

So there is something unusual in this case. If gentlemen could find in the fact that a woman is the widow of a dead President reason sufficient to pension her, we can find in this case, with this history of facts, stronger reasons why pittance enough should be given to this aged woman who has to-day not a relative on earth to aid and sustain her.

She has been unfortunate undoubtedly, because it is unfortunate to be poor; and she has been thrown by circumstances in the frontier State of Nebraska, and, still further, into one of the frontier counties of that State, and at her extreme age she is upon the very outer verge, where the Indian and the buffalo roam on one side and a rude civilization exists on the other.

It would seem that there should be no murmur of disapprobation at granting her a pension of the amount proposed, for we are liberal in many things. We should, if possible, curtail where we are too extravagant and not undertake to restrict where we should be bounteous and liberal. This precedent can certainly have no dangerous result. If there be another like her I trust when she comes to the American Congress she will be received and granted at least a pittance sufficient to give her a support throughout life.

Mr. ALLISON. How old is she?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Nearly 100 years old. A year or two ago Congress was liberal in the bestowal of thousands of dollars for a centennial celebration at Newburgh, in New York, where the great army of the Revolution was disbanded and where probably the most eloquent document that ever went into American literature was circulated, we remember, among the officers of the American Army, wherein it was charged that their Government had been unjust to them, that they were to go back to their homes, devastated and blackened by war, their mere pittance of pay to be in currency which was depreciated; and we recognized the great services of those men, we cherished their memory by bestowing thousands to celebrate their memory. Yet about or near that time was the birth of this now aged woman, born almost in the shock of the Revolution; and she, I trust, may not be allowed now to repeat what her soldier husband could have said during the war of the Revolution, that the Government had been unjust to them. If he said it then, and there was some truth in it, let it not be said one hundred years later than that time that when the widow of one of those soldiers comes to the American Congress and, looking at us with her bowed form and her lusterless eyes and stretching out her famished and skinny hands, asks a pittance for her support, she will be obliged to repeat what her husband declared one hundred years ago.

Mr. President, these are all the facts and all the circumstances attending this case. I trust that this body and the other will not only be liberal in the allowance, but will not show even a murmur of disapprobation to extending aid to the few and fast disappearing class of this kind who are entitled to our benefaction.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out "thirty," in line 9, and insert "twenty;" making the pension $20 per month.

Mr. President, this seems to be a very important case which has drawn forth all the sympathies and the energies and the abilities and the learning of my distinguished friend from Nebraska. I hold in my hand here the report in this case which was made to the Senate by him, in which he says—

That Sally Mallory has been for many years, and is now, on the pension-list, receiving $8 per month, as widow of Benajah Mallory, a soldier in the Revolutionary war, in which he served three years; that he also served during the war of 1812, and was under Harrison at Lundy's Lane.

I believe there is on the floor of the Senate a distinguished descendant of the illustrious hero Harrison; but I had never heard before of his being at Lundy's Lane. I think this matter is of sufficient importance——

Mr. VAN WYCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I intended to say "Scott" not "Harrison."

Mr. COCKRELL. Then the report ought to be recommitted to the committee to be made accurate in its historical allusions.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask unanimous consent that some time or other it may be submitted to the Civil-Service Commission. [Laughter.] I should like to have my history correct.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, Mr. President, this is simply a question of increasing this pension because of the age of this applicant and from pure sympathy. She claims that she is the widow of a soldier of two wars. There are ten thousand more helpless, destitute, disabled widows to-day of the soldiers of two wars. It is nothing uncommon to find the widows of soldiers of two wars now.

I say that there is no justice, there is no right, there is no equity in this bill. It is a dangerous precedent. While it gives to this lady this amount, it brings pangs of improper feeling, it inspires improper feelings in the hearts of thousands of widows who are more helpless, more needy, and more dependent, and who are without one solitary dollar over $8 per month. They think, and they think justly, that this is unjust, that it is not justice on the part of this Government in making fish of one and flesh of another. If we propose to increase pensions because of age, let us pass a general bill and give them all alike, and not have Congress here from day to day and from month to month taking up its time in considering these special bills. That is the reason I am opposed to the bill in toto. If she is entitled to anything, she can not be entitled to over $20.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. MAXEY. I only want to say one word about this matter. The Senator from Missouri avails himself of a mistake made historically in the report in regard to the service of Mr. Mallory at Lundy's Lane under General Harrison. Of course that was a mistake; but the important fact still remains that Mrs. Mallory is the widow of a soldier of the Revolutionary war drawing a pension as such. If there be in all the length and breadth of this land a man, woman, or child who would be unwilling to pay this poor old woman at the rate of $30 a month, I have not yet become acquainted with that person and never want to.

This Government is bearing a retired-list where men are drawing $2,000 or $3,000 and up to $13,000 a year, and the people are making no complaint about that; but here in the case of a widow of a Revolutionary soldier who served three years in the Revolutionary war, now between 90 and 100 years old, complaint is made that we propose to increase her pension from $8 to $30 a month. I only regret that the bill does not propose to pay her $50 a month, and I believe I will move that amendment if I be permitted at this stage of the case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment.

Mr. MAXEY. I move to strike out "thirty" and insert "fifty."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY].

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 13, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—13.

Anthony,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,	Walker.
Bowen,	Manderson,	Palmer,
Call,	Maxey,	Riddleberger,
Conger,	Miller of N. Y.,	Van Wyck.

NAYS—34.

Allison,	Fair,	Jackson,	Pugh,

Coke,	Hampton,	Morrill,	Vest,
Colquitt,	Harris,	Pike,	Wilson.
Cullom,	Harrison,	Platt,
Dawes,	Hawley,	Plumb,

ABSENT—29.

Aldrich,	Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,
Bayard,	Frye,	Lapham,	Sherman,

Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Morgan,
Dolph,	Jonas,	Pendleton,
Edmunds,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon the passage of the bill the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] has demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I think this matter is of sufficient importance to justify a single word in explanation of the vote against this bill which I shall give.

The Revolutionary war ceased one hundred years ago. This lady was not born then. She is only 90 years of age now. She was not born until ten years after the Revolutionary war ceased. If she was married at 20 she was not married until thirty years after the Revolutionary war was over. Now, why this lady who married a Revolutionary soldier at least thirty years after the war had ceased should have $30 a month, when the widows of soldiers who gave their husbands to the war of the rebellion get $8 a month pension, is a thing which I can not understand. All over this land are widows in penury, struggling as best they may to keep the wolf away from their door, who gave, and willingly gave, in their young life their husbands to go forth and battle for their country. They never came back to them, and those widows were left with children to support, and have supported them, and never have found any fault with the pension which this Government has given them. I say that if the pension of widows is to be increased, it should be of those widows who have given their husbands to their country, and not of those who have married soldiers thirty years after the war ceased.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. RANSOM. I am paired on all political questions with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], but this manifestly is not a political question, and I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Allison,	Dolph,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Bowen,	Fair,	Maxey,	Sewell,
Butler,	Garland,	Miller of Cal.,	Van Wyck,
Call,	Harrison,	Miller of N. Y.,	Walker,
Colquitt,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,	Wilson.
Conger,	Jones of Nevada,	Palmer,
Cullom,	Kenna,	Ransom,
Dawes,	McMillan,	Riddleberger,

NAYS—14.

Beck,	Groome,	Morrill,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Pike,	Vest.
Coke,	Jackson,	Platt,

ABSENT—33.

Aldrich,	Farley,	Jonas,	Sabin,

Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Morgan,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill,	Pendleton,
Edmunds,	Hoar,	Plumb,

So the bill was passed.

ARMS FOR THE MILITIA.

The bill (S. 156) to amend section 1661 of the Revised Statutes, making an annual appropriation to provide arms for the militia, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask that that bill go over until to-morrow without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Jersey that this bill go over without prejudice? The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1323) fixing the rate of postage to be paid upon mail matter of the second-class when sent by persons other than the publisher or news agent;

A bill (H. R. 3956) to amend section 2527 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the district of Gloucester; and

A bill (H. R. 4383) to relieve certain soldiers from the charge of desertion.

EDWARD P. VOLLUM.

The bill (S. 363) for the relief of Edward P. Vollum was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to require the Secretary of War to ascertain the value of the property lost by Asst. Surg. Edward P. Vollum, of the Army, who, while under orders of the War Department, was on board the brig Fawn, bound for Fort Umpqua, Oregon Territory, when she was wrecked on the 21st of November, 1856, and the amount so ascertained is to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; but no allowance is to be made for any property except what was useful, necessary, and proper for such an officer while on the voyage and engaged in the public service, and the aggregate amount allowed shall not exceed $700.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to hear the report in that case.

Mr. HARRISON. The report which the Senator from Iowa has asked to have read will not give the facts. Reference is made in it to a previous report from the Committee on Military Affairs on the same subject, which I send to the desk; and, if the Senator desires, it can be read.

Mr. ALLISON. That will do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the report referred to by the Senator from Indiana will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. COCKRELL January 17, 1882:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 293) for the relief of Edward P. Vollum, have duly considered the same, and submit the following report:

In the Forty-sixth Congress a similar bill was before your committee, and the following report was made, to wit:

"In the Forty-fifth Congress a similar bill was introduced and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and the following report was then made by said committee to the Senate:

"This bill requires the Secretary of War to ascertain the value of the property lost by Asst. Surg. Edward P. Vollum, who, while under orders of the War Department, was on board the brig Fawn, bound for Fort Umpqua, Washington Territory, when she was wrecked on the 21st day of November, 1856, and provides for the payment of such sum; provided, that no allowance be made for any property except what was useful, necessary, and proper for such an officer while on the voyage and engaged in the public service.

"Your committee referred the bill to the Secretary of War, and received full information touching the premises, and through him the following report of the Adjutant-General, to wit:

[Extract.]

* * * * * * *

2. Asst. Surg. Edward P. Vollum will proceed to the post on the Umpqua, O. T., and relieve Assistant Surgeon Milhaw, who will then comply with the instructions given in Special Orders No. 44 of May 1, 1856, from the War Department.

By command of Major-General Wool.

W. W. MACKALL,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 4, 1878.

Official extract.

L. H. PELOUZE,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

"Dr. Vollum duly presented his petition for relief in 1857, 1858, 1861, 1864, and then in 1878, and at one time a favorable report was made in the Senate, but no final action had. No action seems to have been had at other times. Dr. Vollum has therefore not been negligent in presenting his claim.

"Dr. Vollum was on board this vessel under orders to go from California to Umpqua, Oreg., the only mode of conveyance at that time, and was in the discharge of official duty; and without fault or neglect on his part, and unavoidably, the vessel was wrecked and his necessary property—personal effects—was wholly lost.

"There is a long line of precedents giving relief in similar cases.

"Your committee believe Dr. Vollum is fairly entitled to relief, and report back the bill without amendment, and recommend its passage.

"Your committeee have again given due consideration to this claim, and find the foregoing report correct.

"Surgeon Vollum, in his letter of December 16, 1856, to the Adjutant-General, states the amount of his loss at $700, and asks the presentation of a claim for that amount. Your committee recommend the passage of the bill herewith reported back to the Senate with an amendment added to the bill in the following words, 'And that the aggregate amount allowed shall not exceed the sum of $700.'"

The bill so reported passed the Senate and was favorably reported in the House. (See Report No. 1723, H. R., made June 9, 1880.)

Your committee adopt said report, and recommend the passage of said bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear from the Senator who reported this bill upon what theory it is that the Government is to be regarded as the insurer of the personal effects of those who enter into the military service. I can not understand why when a surgeon is employed to go to a distant post and taking a vessel is shipwrecked, losing his wearing apparel and instruments, he should be recompensed any more than the officer who loses his effects in battle. It appears to me the question is the same in both cases; and if the Government is to undertake to guarantee to all those who enter its service immunity against the loss of their personal effects there will soon be no difficulty whatever in disbursing the balance of our surplus revenue. I do not know that it has been customary to pass this class of bills, but if it has, I should think it was time to inquire the reason and if possible to put a stop to it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, as the inquiry of the Senator from Kansas is addressed to me, I must respond. Though I have not sufficient age in the Senate to give the origin of this form of relief bill, I can say that since I have been a member of the Military Committee it has not only been the practice of the committee to report favorably but it has been the practice of the Senate to pass such bills as that now under consideration. These bills are always limited to those things that are necessary in the outfit of an officer, uniform and those arms required by the regulations and articles of property of that description. We invariably exclude all of those things that relate simply to his convenience and comfort as a householder at any place or any of those things that he may add for ornament, and have limited it simply and strictly to those things that appertain necessarily to the discharge of his duties as an officer of the Army.

If I am asked on what theory this rests, I do not know except it be this: that in the assignment of quarters, in the methods of conveyance to which these officers are assigned and which they must take in executing their duty, they have not the choice which we have, nor the opportunity to protect themselves against risks. It has seemed, therefore, to the committee, and the precedent of many years has been established on this subject, that losses of this kind should be recompensed. I think it would take a vast number of years to exhaust even a small part of the surplus, for these allowances are always very small and the cases are not numerous.

That, Mr. President, is all I can say with reference to the bill. It is only my bill in the sense of my having reported it.

Mr. INGALLS. Are we to understand that——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. INGALLS. Are we to understand that this bill was reported not because it was right but because it has been customary to report similar bills? The Senator from Indiana wisely refrains from any attempt to justify the report that has been made. He admits that it does not stand upon any defensible ground. It would be just as wise to say that the officer whose effects were in a baggage train upon the march that was assailed by the enemy's cavalry, and captured and burnt, should have the value of his equipments paid to him, as to admit that this surgeon, who was ordered to Oregon and taking vessel was shipwrecked en route, should be held to be guaranteed against loss by the Government.

Of course I have no expectation of opposing the passage of this bill successfully; but merely desire that the Senate should understand that the principle upon which it is reported is false, that it does not stand upon any basis of reason or justice, but is reported simply because other bills of a similar character have been reported and as I suppose they will continue to be reported until the end of time.

Mr. HARRISON. I may ask the same indulgence which has been accorded to the Senator from Kansas; and I may be permitted to say that he is the most successful debater I know of in the Senate when he is allowed to take both his own position and that of his opponent. I never knew him fail to succeed in demolishing an opponent when he had first constructed the position and defense of the person that he was to assail. He misunderstood me if he understood me to say that this bill was not in my opinion defensible.

Mr. President, there is no legal obligation to pay this officer this loss. If there were such an obligation, if we already had a law justifying it, this bill would not have been reported; but it is believed, it has been the opinion of the committee and of the Senate and is my opinion, that in such a case as this the Government may very well and ought as a matter of grace to reimburse such small losses.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I had some years ago the honor of reporting this bill in the same way it is reported now. If there were a legal obligation on the Government the claimant would go into the Court of Claims and enforce it. There being no legal obligation, what the committee think and what the committees of the Senate and of the United States Congress for the last sixty years have thought is that there is an equitable obligation resting upon Congress to pay these claims, and they have accordingly reported this bill, and this bill is only one of the many that have been reported favorably and passed for the last sixty years without exception.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to have the Senator from Missouri tell us how many of these bills have been passed in the last sixty years. I do not recollect very many of them since I have been in the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. There has not been a session of the Senate since I have been here, nine years, but what bills of this kind have been passed. Bills of this kind have passed already at this session. Two more bills we have reported favorably. They have been reported favorably from the Committee on Claims; they have been reported favorably from the Committee on Military Affairs. Both committees have reported them just alike.

Mr. PLUMB. I think I had something to say about this bill when it was before the Senate last year. I do not think any such bill has been passed, the Senate understanding what was before it, without opposition. While it may be that the Senate has committed itself beyond recall to an allowance of this kind, I want to say that I regard it as vicious in the last degree, and if it shall come to be understood that payments of this kind are to be made, of course they will mutiply with alarming frequency. We pay already the officers of our Army a higher salary than is paid to the officers of any army in the world. The United States Army, the regular establishment, without taking any account of contingencies or allowance of this kind or of any extraordinary kind, costs within a few hundred dollars of as much as the entire German Army.

While we boast of the lack of necessity for a standing army and the cheap character of our military establishment, it is well for us to know that what we lack in numbers we make up in pay. In other words, 25,000 men, officered as they are, in the American Army cost within about half a million dollars of as much as 400,000 men in the German army; and yet in various ways we add to the salaries and compensation of the officers of the Army by giving gratuities of this kind and of every other kind which their invention and our abject concession permit them to ask for and us to pass.

If this is done, it ought to be extended to the private soldiers; we ought to give them a chance; and every article of apparel and every other thing which a man may legitimately have in the Army, wherever he goes, if by any misadventure or carelessness of his own or anybody else he loses, he ought to be permitted to put his hand into the Treasury and make himself whole.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator desires, as he says he does, to extend this relief to private soldiers, I say to him that precisely a like case was presented to the committee where by fire a soldier's quarters where he was in the discharge of his duty were burned up and his clothing and equipments destroyed; and we thought he ought to be paid, and we reported a bill for that purpose.

Mr. PLUMB. That is but one case. Can the Senator name another?

Mr. MAXEY. I can name another; the destruction of the steamer Don Cameron, where the clothes of private soldiers were allowed for as well as those of officers.

Mr. PLUMB. There are two cases which the Senator has been able to suggest. He knows very well that if this rule be adopted it will not apply to private soldiers as well as it does to officers, because officers can more easily get here; in fact many of them are detailed here to-day and are doing duty in Washington, where such great military necessities exist, for the purpose of defending Congress, I suppose, or something of that kind, and consequently have opportunity to be in wait, present these bills, and make their influence felt on committees and to obstruct legislation designed to correct abuses in the Army which we are constantly confronted with.

I, for one, am opposed to the whole scheme. There is no other branch of the public service in which we apply anything like as liberal rules as we do in the Army. Why should not officers of the revenue service and officers of the postal service have relief in similar cases? Take the cases of railway postal clerks whose property is destroyed by fire, lost by misadventure of different kinds in their arduous and hazardous service, and a service which, on an average, is more hazardous than that performed by the Army to-day; ought not they to be paid? So taking the whole range of the public service, if this rule is to be established for the Army it ought to apply to the revenue service just as well as to the military service, and the military service is no more entitled to be exempted from the consequences of accidents or casualties than the civil service.

Mr. INGALLS. May I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. Is it customary to pay officers for equipments and clothing and personal effects lost by a raid of enemy's cavalry?

Mr. PLUMB. No, it is not, and never has been; but if my colleague has the curiosity to look at the pay-table he will find that we pay officers of the Army a large percentage more now than we paid them during the time when they rendered actual service in the field; that we have established longevity pay; that we have established for them and for a class of people who, as a rule, have never seen service under fire a pension-list which gives them three-fourths of full pay when on that list that they are entitled to when in active service. In other words, by just as much as we recede from the war and get into a condition where actual military service is impracticable and impossible we give men higher pay and greater privileges.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senate to the fact that Rule VIII limits debate to five minutes for each Senator and says that no Senator shall be heard more than once. The Chair gives this notice, because the present occupant will enforce the rule unless unanimous consent is asked to violate it. This bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?

The question being put, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. HARRISON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANSOM (when Mr. VANCE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. VANCE] is paired on all questions with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. I do not know how either would vote on this question.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HALE. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. RANSOM. I should have stated that my colleague [Mr. VANCE] is absent on business before the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 14; as follows:

MARTIN L. BUNDY.

The bill (S. 543) for the relief of Martin L. Bundy, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the accounting officers in the settlement of the accounts of Martin L. Bundy, late a paymaster in the United States Army, to allow $719.47 for the forage of two horses to which he was entitled, and which was not drawn by him from the 17th of July, 1862, to the 15th of April, 1866.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HARRISON January 22:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 543) for the relief of Martin L. Bundy, respectfully report:

That a bill similar in all respects to this was before the committtee at the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress and was reported favorably.

Your committee adopt the report then submitted, which is as follows:

Major Bundy was appointed additional paymaster, United States Army, on the 31st day of August, 1861, and served as such until the 15th day of April, 1866, when he was honorably discharged and mustered out of the service. During the term of Major Bundy's service he disbursed millions of money, and after his discharge he settled his accounts with the Treasury Department, and on the 22d day of May, 1872, received from the office of the Second Auditor a certificate of non-indebtedness, in these words:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
May 22, 1872.

This is to certify the accounts of Maj. M. L. Bundy, late additional paymaster, United States Army, having been finally adjusted in this office and confirmed by the Second Comptroller, show no indebtedness on his part to the United States.

E. B. FRENCH, Auditor.

About seven years after this, say some time in 1879, upon a readjustment of his accounts by the Second Auditor, it was found that he had received a duplicate credit for the sum of $528.72, and that sum was due from him to the United States.

By the act of July 17, 1862, officers of Major Bundy's rank were entitled to forage for two horses. From that date to the time of his muster out of the service, a period of forty-four months and twenty-nine days, the value of this forage according to the regulations, is $719.47. This forage was never drawn nor was it ever commuted or paid.

Under the circumstances of this case your committee think it is but just that in adjusting Major Bundy's account he should be credited with the value of the forage which was due him under the laws and which he did not receive.

Your committee recommend the following amendment:

After the word "horses" insert the words "to which he was entitled, and which was". And when so amended your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NANCY MILLER.

The bill (S. 494) for the relief of Nancy Miller was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of Nancy Miller, widow of Thomas Miller, late a private in Company M, Eighth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. CULLOM January 22:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 494) for the relief of Nancy Miller, having considered the same, make the following report:

That the application for pension made by Nancy Miller, widow of Thomas Miller, said to have been a member of Company M, Eighth Tennessee Cavalry, was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions on the ground that no proof that said Miller was in the military service, as alleged, was found in the records of the Adjutant-General of the United States Army, the adjutant-general of Tennessee, the Paymaster-General of the United States Army, or the Hon. Second Auditor of the Treasury Department. On all other points the Commissioner reports the case as complete.

That in proof of said Miller's service claimant submitted the affidavit of Nelson McLaughlin, who was captain of Company M, Eighth Tennessee Cavalry, and who testified that he recruited Thomas Miller August 27, 1863, in Washington County, Tennessee, into said company and regiment; that Miller drew rations and served and did duty as a private in said company and regiment from the date of his enlistment until October 19, 1863, when "he was granted leave of absence on furlough to go to Yancey County, North Carolina, and on his return back to his command he was attacked by the rebels, or enemy, and by them killed on the 6th of November, 1863."

That Frederick Ledford and James R. Anderson, citizens of Yancey County, North Carolina, certified, under date of December 2, 1867, that they knew the said Miller, "late a private in Company M, Thirteenth (Eighth) Regiment Tennessee Cavalry;" that they saw him a corpse a few minutes after he had been shot: that the rebel soldiers present said they had killed him; and that said Ledford and Anderson assisted in making Miller's coffin and in burying him the next day.

That since the rejection of this claim by the Commissioner a statement has been submitted, which was sworn to August 18, 1882, by Samuel Miller, Peter Peterson, John Miller, and J. G. Cooper, residents of Hollow Poplar, N. C., which furnishes an explanation for the failure to find Miller's name on the muster-rolls, and for the fact that Captain McLaughlin should have sworn that he enlisted Miller before the company was organized, according to the records, and should have failed to give in Miller's name.

From this statement it appears that in November, 1863, while the Eighth Tennessee Cavalry was being formed, it was assigned to guard duty at Mossy Creek, Tenn.; that Colonel Patton gave the recruits ten days' furlough, by general order, for the purpose of visiting their homes and procuring necessary clothing, with orders to report at Jonesborough for duty; that about this time General Burnside's command fell back to Knoxville, to which place Longstreet laid siege; that the Eighth Tennessee, not having been organized, and being engaged in recruiting, did not go to Knoxville, but during the siege marched, under orders, to Camp Nelson, Kentucky, where the regiment was organized, and then marched to Nashville; that said Miller, with many others who enlisted about the same time, was cut off from his company, and was not able to reach Jonesborough, where the recruits had been ordered to report, because of the occupation of the country by the enemy; that during the said siege the Union men of that locality were exposed to great danger from the enemy, and on this account no regular muster-rolls of enlisted recruits were kept by the enlisting officers, but affiants affirm of their own knowledge that Miller performed the services claimed in his widow's application, and that prior thereto he was enlisted as all other men were enlisted throughout that section at that time; that Miller was enlisted August 27, 1863, and went into camp at once; that in a few days the company went to Mossy Creek, Tenn., and remained on guard duty until November 19, 1863, when the recruits were furloughed by general order by Colonel Patton, and that Miller was killed while on the way to rejoin his command, about November 25, 1863.

Therefore, believing that the fact of said Miller's service has been sufficiently well established, and that this claim is one that calls for the favorable action of Congress, the committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

J. C. JORGENSEN.

The bill (S. 667) for the relief of First Sergt. J. C. Jorgensen was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. Is there a report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no printed report. The bill is reported by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SEWELL. First Sergeant Jorgensen passed the usual examination provided for enlisted men of the Army to become an officer, and would have been appointed but for the fact that by the time the examination reached the War Department he was a month older than the arbitrary rule of the Department fixed for such an appointment. He was recommended by every officer of the regiment and is personally known to the chairman of the Military Committee as one of the best non-commissioned officers in the service. He performed this act of gallantry during a thunder-storm, as alleged in the preamble of the bill. The bill is simply to give authority to make the appointment.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment in line 5, after the word "to," to strike out "confer upon" and insert "appoint;" and in line 6, after the word "a," to strike out "commission as;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint First Sergt. J. C. Jorgensen, Troop K, Fourth United States Cavalry, a second lieutenant in the cavalry arm of the service, for distinguished conduct and cool, determined courage under the following circumstances: On the 23d of August, 1883, during a violent thunder-storm, lightning struck the end of the troop corral at Fort Wingate, N. Mex., and passing into the troop store-room exploded several boxes of ammunition. Having discovered the location of the fire, First Sergt. J. C. Jorgensen broke into the store-room and carried out of the building the burning boxes of cartridges and some powder which stood beside them. Sergeant Jorgensen has passed the necessary examination required by law for applicants for appointment to the grade of second lieutenant, and has been strongly recommended for promotion by the board of officers which examined him.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER. Is there a preamble?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no preamble.

Mr. CONGER. Is the statement that was read a part of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary reports that there is no preamble. The statement the Senator refers to is in the body of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I understood there was a preamble. I think there should be a report giving the argument. That should not be in the body of the bill.

Mr. SEWELL. There is nothing objectionable in it. It merely gives the reason for the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan will have to move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed and the vote by which it was ordered to a third reading in order to reach what he desires.

Mr. CONGER. If it is desired to put a statement giving the reason for their passage in the laws, I make no objection.

Mr. SEWELL. It is a very proper statement.

GEORGE P. WEBSTER.

The bill (S. 472) for the relief of George P. Webster was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the accounting officers of the Treasury to place to the credit of George P. Webster, late a captain and assistant quartermaster of volunteers, the amount suspended in his accounts as such quartermaster, which was disbursed in payments of rents for certain property in the city of Covington, Ky., used for military purposes during the period from October 1, 1862, to August 31, 1865.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, January 22:

This is a bill authorizing and directing the accounting officers of the Treasury Department to place to the credit of George P. Webster, late captain and assistant quartermaster United States volunteers, the amount suspended in his accounts as such quartermaster which was disbursed in payment of rents for certain property in the city of Covington, State of Kentucky, used for military purposes during the period from October 1, 1862, to August 31, 1865, and releasing the said George P. Webster and his official sureties or bondsmen from any liability to the United States on account of the amount suspended.

The report of the Treasury Department upon this bill shows that Captain Webster paid the rents in question under verbal and written instructions from Col. G. V. Rutherford, assistant quartermaster and inspecting officer of the Quartermaster-General's Office on duty in the West; that he, Captain Webster, had refused to make such payments as long as he felt that he had any discretion in the matter, and that he only paid them after he had received positive verbal orders and written instructions to do so from an officer who came to him from the Quartermaster-General's Office, and assumed to have full authority to control the action of Captain Webster in the premises, which Captain Webster believed that he had.

The payments were at once reported by Captain Webster to General Donaldson, chief quartermaster of the military department in which he was on duty, who, after sending an officer to examine the property for which the rents were paid and to investigate the subject generally, approved the payments.

The accounting officers of the Treasury do not question that the property was used as alleged, and that the payments for rents were made by Captain Webster as stated in his accounts; neither do they doubt that Captain Webster declined to do so until ordered by a superior officer, having due authority, as he (Webster) and other officers believed.

But the accounting officers object to the form of the written order given Captain Webster by Colonel Rutherford, and also do not acknowledge that Colonel Rutherford had authority to direct the payments to be made, and therefore have declined to give Captain Webster credit for the amount of these rents.

The Third Auditor says: "It has never been charged, so far as known to the accounting officers, that there was any collusion between Captain Webster or any other person or persons regarding these payments, or that he acted in any other manner than in perfect good faith in respect thereto," and concludes as follows:

"I see no objection to the applicant being afforded such equitable relief as Congress may in its judgment deem proper."

There being no question as to the facts, and no doubt of Captain Webster's entire good faith in the matter, but the accounting officers being of opinion that an act of Congress is required to obviate difficulties of settlement of Captain Webster's accounts, the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL STEEL VESSELS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. HALE. I desire the consent of the Senate to make the bill (S. 698) to authorize the construction of additional steel vessels for the Navy the special order for Monday next at 2 o'clock, which will take it out of any interference with the Calendar. I know that Senators are desirous that special orders shall not be made to conflict with the bills upon the Calendar. I will say here that I shall be obliged to be absent for some time after next week, and am anxious that the sense of the Senate should be taken upon the bill.

I would fix an earlier day but for the fact that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], a member of the Naval Committee, will be absent the last of this week, and I have fixed next Monday because I believe that that will suit him.

I will say further that I do not believe the bill will give rise to much debate or that much time will be taken with it; but I think it very important that it should be taken up soon and the sense of the Senate expressed upon it. I ask that the assignment be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to making the bill referred to by the Senator from Maine the special order for Monday next at 2 o'clock? [A pause.] The Chair hears none, and the order will be entered.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations, the pending question being on the following amendment, proposed by Mr. PLUMB as an additional section:

SEC. 2. That whenever the circulation of any national bank, or any portion thereof, shall be surrendered, and the same is not taken up by other national banks within thirty days thereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon issue an equivalent amount of Treasury notes of the denominations now provided by law for national-bank notes. Said Treasury notes shall be deposited in the Treasury and paid out as other moneys kept for the discharge of the obligations of the Government. They shall be receivable for salaries and for all dues to the Government, including duties on imports; shall be a legal tender between national banks and for all debts due to any national bank; shall be redeemable in coin, as the legal-tender notes of the United States now are; and when received into the Treasury they shall be reissued, and when mutilated or worn they shall be replaced, in the same manner as now provided by law for said legal-tender notes. The coin held in the Treasury at the date of the passage of this act for the redemption of the legal-tender notes of the Government shall also be applicable to the redemption of the Treasury notes herein provided for; and such coin reserve may, from time to time, be increased by adding thereto other sums from payments made into the Treasury, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That the total amount of said coin reserve shall never be less than 25 per cent. nor more than 30 per cent. of the total amount of legal-tender and Treasury notes outstanding; the true intent and meaning of this section being that the volume of paper money outstanding, exclusive of gold and silver certificates, shall remain as now existing.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, this amendment of course will be a test question, as to whether the Senate propose now that the Government of the United States shall go into the banking business. Although I am suffering from so severe a cold that I am unable to continue the debate, I desire to speak briefly on this question. The proposition of the Senator from Kansas is that the notes issued by the Government to the banks in accordance with commercial interests shall now be replaced under the process indicated by notes issued directly from the Treasury.

We have heard a great deal of the power of the national banks, and there has been a good deal of fiery and lurid rhetoric from the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and his friend from Texas [Mr. COKE] as to the supposed power of these moneyed institutions, which it was even alleged had cast its shadow over this Chamber and destroyed the personal independence of members of the body, so that they are bound hand and foot to obey the dictates, whatever they may be, of these supposed corporate giants.

The answer to that would be in my judgment that if this power does exist, it is open to any five men in the country who can command the sum of $50,000, to become copartners in it. It is absolutely free to any five men who can command so much capital; for under the present law they can organize a national bank, and thus become powerful and great and controlling, according to the pictures drawn in this Chamber of such institutions.

But it seems to me that while gentlemen are expressing dread of the influence and power of aggregated capital, they are strangely blind to another and greater power which they seek to create in their attempt to escape from the first.

Of all the depths that have ever been imagined, of all the propositions that have ever been made in favor of the centralization of the powers of this Government, there is not one in my opinion comparable to the suggestion of turning the Treasury of the United States into a bank of issue, and controlling the volume of the currency, not by the commercial necessities of the people, but by the accidental will of an accidental majority in the two Houses of Congress. I can not understand what gentlemen mean when they profess a dread of the aggregated power of capital, and at the same time are ready to commit this question, so purely commercial, to the political departments of the Government, and provide that the exigency of party shall take the place of commercial necessity, and that a power in its nature wholly commercial is to be controlled in its operation by political laws!

Mr. President, this amendment is in reality measuring the wants of the future by the supply of the past.

That whenever the circulation of any national bank, or any portion thereof, shall be surrendered, and the same is not taken up by other national banks within thirty days thereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon issue an equivalent amount of Treasury notes of the denominations now provided by law for national-bank notes.

It is a proposition, then, that the volume of currency which has been found useful by these banks shall remain the same, and an equivalent amount of Treasury notes is to be issued upon what is termed a surrender of their currency. As a matter of fact, however, their currency is not surrendered. For when the notes of a bank have once been issued, their universal receivability undoubtedly carries them all over the country, and it would become an absolute impossibility for the bank to gather up its circulation and to retire it even in a large percentage.

Looking at that fact, it became necessary long ago to pass the law now existing, which enables the bank desiring to give up the business to obtain its bonds and retire its currency, to take the Treasury notes of the United States in lieu of their own and place them in the Treasury.

I have not the means at hand to know what percentage of a bank's own currency, that is to say the currency that originally was issued to that bank, has ever been returned by it to the Treasury at the time it withdrew from the business of banking or when its business was wound up. I have seen and heard, however, of quite a large premium being offered by the bank to get its own notes back for the purpose of going into liquidation or giving up the business of the issue of notes. It was,

I suppose, that difficulty which caused the enactment of the law permitting the deposit of greenbacks in lieu of the currency originally issued to the identical bank.

What the practical and immediate effect of such a proposition as this is to be I do not know. I think it would not work practically in accord with the wishes or design of the Senator who offers this amendment; but that is not my objection to it. It is an amendment wholly at variance with and entirely destructive of the proposition reported by me from the committee.

It seems to me that the measure as it came from the committee has been misunderstood. It apparently has not been appreciated either by those who have discussed it in this Chamber or outside. It was not intended to create a new banking system, but it was to continue the principle of the present currency and banking system, and it only meant to give a more liberal ratio of the currency notes issued by the Government upon the deposit of bonds.

In round numbers there are over $700,000,000 of 4 per cent. bonds which can not be paid until 1907. These bonds in common with the 3 percents and 4½ percents will be the legitimate basis of deposit upon which 100 per cent. of currency will be issued.

I know that, with the present amount of bonds held by the banks, which is about $350,000,000, if you are to take but 10 per cent. upon that, it may be called an inadequate provision against the contraction that is to follow if $200,000,000 of the 3 per cent. bonds are paid off in the next three years; but the very principle of the present banking law provides for an expansion of the currency in response to the commercial demand for it. It is doing that which the Government itself never can do. It is using these commercial associations, whose business is transacted entirely upon commercial principles, to perform the work of commerce and to adopt their action, their investments, their issues, entirely in accord with the laws of self-preservation. The function of the Government is completed when the currency that is so issued and is so received all over the country is made secure in the hands of the noteholder.

I do not know whether the 4 per cent. bonds now selling at so high a premium will be used by the banks to replace the 3 per cent. bonds that are now being so rapidly called in and paid off, as long as they are subjected to a tax of 1 per cent. in addition to the tax they pay in common with all other property under the State laws. I do not know practically what inducement there will be. Having no knowledge or interest (I mean by interest, a personal interest in any banking institution) I will not say whether the profit will induce the substitution of the 4 per cent. bonds at their present premium for the 3 per cent. bonds as they are called in and paid off under the present law; but I believe that they will be so used, and that the law that will control their use will be the commercial necessity for an increased volume of currency; and if it shall be assisted by taking the tax off their circulation, and it becomes discreet and wise to enact such a law, I am afraid that notwithstanding my fear of the displeasure of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] I will be found voting in favor of it.

I do not believe that there will be the vacuum created of $60,000,000 per annum of currency, for I believe that as the 3 per cent. bonds are paid, the banking will continue under the pressure of the necessity for banks, and under the approval of the American people of the system and of the currency under the system; and that the 4 per cent. bonds will be bought, which will be made the basis for the circulation, and the contraction apprehended will not occur. Certain it is that if it does occur the present laws offer a remedy for it. Twice the number of bonds can be taken under the national banking system than are now held under it, and twice the volume of the currency issued to them can be obtained if it is profitable to obtain it and if commercial necessity calls for it. That is the law that should govern currency—a commercial law and commercial power, which can not be fitly executed by a political power whose exigencies, under the spirit of party that so controls in a republic, would be attempted to measure one force and one necessity by a power and a tendency wholly different in principle from the subject-matter to which it relates.

Believing that this is the suggestion of the commencement or the recommencement of a system and of a step which is one of centralization of the most extreme nature, the creation of a power that I never willingly shall see created, I hope the Senate will emphatically refuse its assent to the proposition of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

What may be done or needed when the debt of the United States shall have been paid we can better tell when that period arrives. Twenty-three years lie between us and that consummation. Undoubtedly the question of a redundant revenue, the accumulation of this excess of $100,000,000 in the Treasury, is embarrassing and is an evil in every way it can be looked at. It impoverishes the people and it compels the use of the money in some way, and at present the very natural and obvious way of buying in and paying off the interest-bearing debt of the United States.

I have nothing to say at this time in regard to another portion of the debt of the United States, and that is the $350,000,000 of Treasury notes, the demand notes, that are not paid and that are nothing but a form of debt conveniently used at this time by the people of this country as their currency. That is part of the legacy of a war. It stands there. There is no proposition that I know of now before the committee or the Senate to interfere with that, but the proposition is now made by the Senator from Kansas to extend the principle and to enter this Government upon a system of governmental banking. I for one am not prepared for it, but should be false to my sense of duty, false to every conviction I have upon the wisdom and justice of Government interference with this question, if I did not upon every occasion record my vote and raise my voice against it, and particularly now do I wish to emphasize my protest against the issue of demand notes by the Government as a currency for the people—an expedient that has always proved too strong for the virtue of legislators.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, we are confronted with a condition of things which seems to call for some remedy. The system which the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] so lauds as being one designed to and capable of furnishing a currency which shall adjust itself to the wants of business from time to time has confessedly failed in performing that function. It was not left for me to say that here for the first time, but it was left for the Finance Committee of this body, under its great authority, to present that as the reason why a measure which they reported should be passed. Bear in mind that that is not only so because of the retirement of the national debt, but it is so because the banks themselves have not taken out all the currency which they are now authorized by law to take out. That exhibits an inherent defect in the system, superadded to which is this other cause, the retirement of the national debt.

If the system will itself furnish all the currency that is necessary, why are the Senator from Delaware and those who agree with him in supporting the bill of the Senator from New Jersey advocating upon this floor the absolute addition by the fiat of legislation of $35,000,000 bodily to the volume of the currency?

Mr. VEST. Forty-five million dollars by the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. PLUMB. As the Senator from Missouri suggests, the amendment of the Senator from Vermont would add $45,000,000 to the volume of the currency. It seems to me that we ought to have done with any further talking about this self-adjusting system answering the wants of the country with reference to currency. By the mouth of everybody and by the legislation proposed it is confessed that the system has failed, fundamentally failed, and is in danger not only of going down itself but of carrying down with it the entire structure of the business interests of this country; and the question is now addressed to us as practical men and as men having responsibilities, what shall we do to prevent this calamity? because it can be characterized by no lighter term than that.

The Senator from Delaware said (he need not have said it though, but he did say it) that he himself could not tell what inducement would be necessary upon the part of Congress to induce the banks to take 4 per cent. bonds and thereby give permanency to the volume of currency. We are to-day wrestling with that problem; and after all that can be said, and after all that has been said, it is only a guess at the very best. We have the authority of the gentlemen who have reported this bill, and who have proposed various amendments to it increasing the ratio of the currency to bonds, but against them we have the testimony of the president of a bank in the city of New York, speaking from the standpoint of the banks, in which he says that every one and all of these remedies will be absolutely futile.

It therefore behooves us to do something which shall as nearly as possible make it certain that the volume of the currency will not be reduced during the period of time that Congress shall be in vacation. In order to do that I have proposed the amendment which has been the subject of the remarks of the Senator from Delaware, confessing when I offered it that it was only for a temporary purpose. But it is justified by the action of Congress in arresting the retirement of the greenback notes. The Senator from Delaware says that is fashioning the currency of the future upon the experience of the past. What is his proposition? It is to add to the currency of to-day $35,000,000 or $40,000,000 without adequate provision for any further increase whatever, and with nothing that any one can say with any authority will prevent the reduction of that currency at any moment of time.

Mr. BAYARD. Would it interrupt the Senator for me to say a few words?

Mr. PLUMB. No, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. I did say that the amendment of the Senator from Kansas was a proposition to measure the volume of the currency of the future by the volume of the past, because he provides for an issue of a different class of notes of an equivalent amount to those which shall be surrendered; so that of course if no more are to be issued than are surrendered the amount will be the same; there is to be no progress at all in that way, no increase in the volume. That was one of my comments.

I wish to say further that there is no necessity for the Senate by additional legislation to provide for an increase in the volume of the currency, because the banking system itself provides for that. The Senator himself, an active and vigorous banker, can obtain 100 per cent., if this amendatory bill becomes a law, or under the present law 90 per cent. of currency upon just such amount of bonds as he chooses to invest his money in for the purpose of obtaining currency. If the demand shall be created from any cause for an increase in the volume of the currency, the present banking system permits it to be done. The proof of that has been the growth of the number of banks all over the United States until at this time I believe there is no Territory and no State that does not contain one or more new banks.

Mr. PLUMB. I am obliged to the Senator from Delaware for calling my attention to the new banks. He will find by an examination of their statistics that with very few exceptions each bank has taken out the smallest possible amount of currency allowable. He will find that in all that region of country west of the Mississippi River where there have been the largest additions to the number of banks, the persons organizing them have desired simply to have the charter for the reason that it has given them added credit; that they have had no concern about the amount of currency to be added to the general volume existing in the country, but have taken out the smallest possible amount which the law enabled them to do.

Mr. BAYARD. But they can take out the full amount of 90 per cent.

Mr. PLUMB. They have not done it, and because they have not done it, and because independent of the increase in the number of banks there has been a retirement of the actual amount of circulation, we are proposing legislation to do that which the banks themselves will not do, having refused to do it with the full opportunity.

Mr. BAYARD. If I am not interrupting the Senator, let me ask, would it be any more compulsory than it is now? There is no compulsion on a bank to take out currency.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand that perfectly well, and for that very reason, as it is remitted to their self-interest, they are not likely to take it out to any extent except simply as we give it to them as a gratuity, as is provided by the bill of the Senator from New Jersey. They will take it out because the bank that has $50,000 in bonds, having 90 per cent. of circulation, will be glad of course to have the additional 10 per cent. As I said, we are providing by legislation to absolutely increase the currency by the amount of 10 per cent. at least, but it has not been demonstrated, and can not be demonstrated (on the contrary there is a divided opinion existing here), that the bill of the Senator from New Jersey will induce the banks to take out more currency beyond the amount of the 10 per cent. which we give to them absolutely for nothing.

If the past is to be any guide for the future, the banks will take out $35,000,000 or $45,000,000 of currency, according to whichever of these measures we adopt, and then as the bonds are paid off, as they are bound to be, at the rate of $60,000,000 or $70,000,000, or perhaps $100,000,000, per annum until the 3 percents are exhausted, we shall lose from the currency every time a bank goes out of business not 90 per cent. of its currency, as now, but 100 per cent., as then; that is to say, the retirement of the currency will be 10 per cent. greater than it will be under the system now existing by law.

The Senator from New Jersey hopes of course that this 10 per cent. addition will induce the banks to buy 4 per cent. bonds. Why did they not buy them when they were at 115? The reason why they did not was well stated by the president of the New York Mercantile National Bank. He said there is an instinctive and overwhelming repugnance in the minds of all bankers to a premium account. If they would not take the bonds at 115 or at 120 in order to get the privilege of continuing with this currency, are they likely to take them when we give them 100 per cent. of circulation, and by that act put the premium on the bonds up beyond 35? I can not escape a very strong conviction that this legislation will put the premium on the bonds to 30, and that when the premium is at 30, instead of the banks buying the bonds in order to base currency upon them, we run great risks that the banks already holding them will sell at least as many as they can and save their charters in order to get the added premium to go into their profit-and-loss account.

So far as I am concerned I have no objection to the national banking system continuing until by the extinguishment of the debt and the expiration of their charters the banks shall disappear in a natural, easy, noiseless way; but we are confronted with the fact that the national banking system has failed to answer the purposes of its creation; that the business of the country dependent upon the volume of currency which it gives is rendered liable to destruction by the withdrawal of that currency; and I for one propose to exercise my judgment as clearly as I can for the determination of what measure will prevent what I can only conceive as a calamity which is impending over the country.

No matter what else may be said about this proposition of mine, it will at least prevent the contraction of the currency. There is that much that is sure; and it is not a currency that is not to be good, but it is a currency that is to depend for its value upon precisely the same source and basis as the greenback note itself does, of which we have had heretofore ample experience and an experience which has been so acceptable to the people of this country that they are at least not going to do without it. When the next Congress meets, or the next after that, or whenever it shall be demonstrated that a still further enlargement is necessary, that can be taken up as a subject apart from all other questions and considered then in the light of the safety which we shall have provided in the adoption of a measure which simply puts into the same channel with the retiring national-bank note a Treasury note which follows it up, taking its place just as fast as the national banks go out of existence. Anything that will not do this utterly fails to meet the case.

When I think of the great authority of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] and of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], opposed to the equally great authority of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and how widely apart they are, and when I then consider that the banking interest itself, by the representative of one of the greatest banks of New York city, comes in and says they are all wrong, it seems to me it is time to consider whether we are not actually engaged in doing an idle thing.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before the Senator takes his seat, if he will allow me, he states that his amendment will certainly prevent any contraction of the currency. As I understand his amendment it will also prevent any expansion of the currency.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes; it will.

Mr. MITCHELL. It will absolutely prevent any expansion of the currency under the national banking law.

Mr. PLUMB. It will prevent the expansion of the currency except as it is expanded by the operation of law providing for the issuing of gold and silver certificates. It leaves the only lee-way, so to speak, in the amount of currency with reference to its enlargement to come from the production of the precious metals and their coinage.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is therefore a measure which would result in the destruction of the principle and the quality of freedom in the national banking system?

Mr. PLUMB. Not at all. It will not prevent any national bank from increasing its circulation; it will not prevent any new national bank from taking out circulation.

Mr. MITCHELL. It will not?

Mr. PLUMB. Not at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then the Senator and I misunderstand each other, as I construe his amendment. When may a national bank take out new circulation under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. PLUMB. At any time. It does not interfere with the operations of the national banking system at all. If it shall become a law, whenever any national bank shall retire its circulation and it shall not be taken up during the next succeeding thirty days, then the Secretary of the Treasury is to issue new Treasury notes; but the operation of the issuance of new national-bank notes is not interfered with at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I understand the Senator's amendment to mean, according to his interpretation, that if a national bank having $100,000 of bonds deposited in the Treasury and having taken $90,000 of circulation out should surrender this $90,000, any other national bank may come in after that and take that currency.

Mr. PLUMB. They may do that, but they may do better. They may take it without any reference to that.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then what becomes of the clause in the amendment proposed by the Senator which reads as follows:

> The true intent and meaning of this section being that the volume of paper money outstanding, exclusive of gold and silver certificates, shall remain as now existing.

Mr. PLUMB. I moved that at the suggestion of a Senator who said that he thought it would add to the value of the amendment. It did not strike me that way, but I offered it last evening, and I propose to withdraw that part of my amendment, because I do not think it necessary to the operation of the section.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand that the Senator from Kansas now proposes to modify his amendment by striking off that part of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas propose to modify his amendment at this time?

Mr. PLUMB. I had not proposed to do it at this time, but I had proposed some time before the amendment was voted on to withdraw the clause I added last evening at the close of my amendment, and which while not in any way impairing the effect of it, as I think, at the same time is not necessary; and I will now withdraw the last sentence of the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the clause to be withdrawn be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report that part of the amendment which the Senator from Kansas proposes to withdraw.

The Secretary read as follows:

> The true intent and meaning of this section being that the volume of paper money outstanding, exclusive of gold and silver certificates, shall remain as now existing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be modified as suggested by the Senator from Kansas who moved it. The question is upon agreeing to the same as modified.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, I did not intend to say a single word upon the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] nor in fact to say a single word with respect to any amendment now pending to the bill. The bill speaks for itself. It is a plain, simple proposition which any man and every man can understand. We propose to issue currency up to the face value of the bonds, and to the face value only. The other propositions mean something more, and I do not agree with them. I would not rise now were it not to call attention to certain statements made yesterday by the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] when addressing the Senate, which if I pass them unheeded will tend to falsify the record I had made in the past. I will call attention to the remarks he made. He said:

I recollect that in 1881, when we offered the national banks a 3 per cent. thirty-year bond, they took the Government by the throat, retired eighteen millions of currency in one day in the city of New York, crushed down the industries and interests of the country, and my distinguished friend from New Jersey in front of me [Mr. MCPHERSON] stood here and eulogized the national banks as the great benefactors of the country, as the agencies that had preserved the national life, as the instrumentality under God to which the American people should sing pæans of praise for all time to come.

I have no recollection at any time since I have been honored with a seat upon the floor of the Senate that I have ever eulogized the national banks beyond their deserts. The national banking system as originally formed was not alone for the purpose of giving the people circulation; it was for the purpose of circulating and disposing of the bonds of the Government among the people; and as to the currency of the national banks, I say it is the best currency attainable at this time or at any time since it was adopted. I did say this, and only this, that I was in favor of the continuance of the national banking system until some substitute—mark the language—until some substitute equal to all the mutations of confidence, business, and credit should be first found to take its place. That is the position I hold to-day. I would not disturb the financial affairs of this country to any extent which could injure its commercial interests and the prosperity of its people. The honorable Senator from Missouri went on further to say:

The national banks to-day, instead of asking for a perpetual debt, are tiding over the obstructions which are placed in their way by the bonds of the country becoming due, until twenty-three years from now, as indicated by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], our children will take charge of them and see that they exist henceforth and forever. For the present the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from New Jersey are simply meeting the little obstacles that are in the way of the national banks and tiding matters over till hereafter, when the last dollar of the national debt shall be paid, and the ingenuity of some financier will find means to fasten this national-bank system upon the people for all time to come.

During a former discussion in this Chamber with respect to the basis upon which the national banks should stand I did not agree with the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. I have never agreed with him. I was not wise enough (if that be the word) to agree with the honorable Senator from Ohio upon the question as to whether the bonds should bear 3 per cent., as I wanted, or 4 per cent. interest, as he wanted. I had the honor to introduce into this Chamber a bill providing for a 3 per cent. bond having thirty years to run. I accepted a modification of that bill reducing the time of maturity of the bond to twenty years. I believed then and I believe now that my proposition was the true and proper solution of the whole question. I did not agree with gentlemen on this side of the Chamber that it was the duty of this Government to pay the public debt at such break-neck speed. The people of this country had lost in lives, in property, and in productive industry more than any people had ever before suffered upon the face of the earth, and I believe the true policy was to let posterity pay a part of the debt. We have a pension debt amounting to almost a hundred million of dollars per year, but the pensioner will not always live, he will not be here always to receive it. I claimed that it was our duty to pay the pensioner, but to extend the public debt to a time when posterity should bear a part of its burdens.

The only difference between the honorable Senator from Ohio and myself in the past has been that when I preferred a 3 per cent. bond he thought it could not be maintained at par (and advocated a 4 per cent. instead), although at a later period his views had changed, and I think he introduced and defended a 3 per cent. bond bill. The difference between us to-day is as radical as ever; he demands a greater favor to the banks than I am willing to allow. Therefore it will hardly do to say that I am assailing the Senator from Ohio to meet the little obstacles in the way of the national banks.

Mr. President, it is not my custom to take much of the time of the Senate in defending my own record or in assailing the record of other Senators, but having been always upon the side other than that where the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] places me, I feel impelled to put the Senator right.

Now, we are confronted with another condition. The 3 per cent. bonds are being paid very rapidly; they are disturbing the circulation which rests upon them; and Congress has been asked to devise a remedy. The remedy we propose is all the remedy that can safely be given. We propose to issue circulation upon the bond to its face value and no more. The Senator from Kansas says that is insufficient; that it is an inadequate remedy. That may be so. I do not know that the banks will invest in a 4 per cent. bond at a high rate of premium sufficient to keep the circulation equal to what it is to-day; but I do know that it is a measure in the right direction, and it is a measure of assistance. It proposes to issue, if the banks call for it, $35,000,000 more of currency.

I do not share in the alarm expressed by the honorable Senator, that if the bonds should reach 130 the banks will not buy them and continue their banking business. I claim that successful banking can be done upon a 4 per cent. bond at a premium of 25 per cent., and it will yield to the banks all that I think they are entitled to when we consider the other advantages which this system of banking offers. As for believing that the currency will be contracted to any dangerous extent, I do not share in that alarm.

Mr. President, I will say no more. I only wished to rise to answer and to set my friend from Missouri right. I wish the honorable Senator to understand that from the first, since I became a member of this body, I have been invariably found upon the side of a bond bearing the lowest rate of interest. I believe that a 3 per cent. bond expresses that. There is no country upon the earth that has been able to maintain a bond yielding only 3 per cent. interest to the investor at a point much above par. A 3 per cent. bond expresses perhaps the happy medium, or the extent to which we can go in reducing the rate of interest to a point that will maintain the bond at par.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it matters very little, I presume, to-day what any Senator said in 1881 or how he voted then, and I certainly wish to disclaim any intention to pervert or misrepresent the record of the Senator from New Jersey. I supposed that his position on the national-bank question had been deliberately taken and was well understood by himself and by the country.

I repeat that in 1881—the RECORD will bear me out—the Senator from New Jersey, as I stated yesterday, stood here and declared that the national banks had preserved the national life and that they were the instrument to which the American people owed the existence of their Government. If that was not praise of the banks, I do not know what it was.

Now the Senator says that he and the Senator from Ohio did not agree in 1881. The fight in 1881 was over the Carlisle amendment which took away the power of the national banks to expand or contract the currency at their will, as I said yesterday. In 1881 the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Ohio fought shoulder to shoulder against that amendment, and the Senator from New Jersey did not utter a word that was not in the direction of giving to the national banks this terrible and extraordinary power of controlling the entire monetary interests of the country. The record shows the fact to be that the national banks, when they found the Carlisle amendment was put into the act of Congress, clamored, as I said yesterday, around the White House, they inundated the Executive Mansion with telegrams, they sent committees here until these corridors were almost blocked with them, and they said "if you do not take out that amendment, if you do not veto this bill, we will strike down the credit of the country," and they did produce a panic which appalled the business interests of the whole country. Gentlemen should think of these facts. The Senator from New Jersey says I misrepresent him. I deny it.

Now the Senator says with regard to the question before the Senate at this time that he is in favor of continuing the public debt. I understand that to be the position of my friend, that he thinks posterity should pay a portion of it. The distinguished Senator voted for the tariff bill that passed here at the last session, which creates more than $100,000,000 of surplus revenue each year; and yet the Senator says he is opposed to paying the national debt, he is in favor of retaining this surplus revenue. Now what does he propose to do with it? I should like to know from him. He is a financier and I am not. I want him to tell me what he proposes to do with the $100,000,000 of surplus that every year is put into the Treasury. He does not want to pay the debt. I suppose my friend wants to keep it as a sort of financial bric-a-brac for the inspection of the country at large. I am not. I want to use that money. I say that the Senator who stands on this floor and says that he is for the perpetuation of the public debt of this country is in defiance of a public sentiment that is overwhelming and universal. No Senator that I know of dare take that position except the Senator from New Jersey, that he is for the perpetuation of the debt for any purpose whatever. I am astonished and astounded to hear that the Senator deliberately announces that platform; but, sir, he announces it for himself alone.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, my honorable friend has wandered over such a wide range of subjects for material that I may be pardoned if I fail to notice them all. I may neglect some, but to follow him I must come back to the point. In his speech of yesterday he said, if the RECORD be true:

I recollect that in 1881, when we offered the national banks a 3 per cent. thirty-year bond, they took the Government by the throat, retired eighteen millions of currency in one day in the city of New York, crushed down the industries and interests of the country, and my distinguished friend from New Jersey in front of me [Mr. MCPHERSON] stood here and eulogized the national banks as the great benefactors of the country, as the agencies that had preserved the national life, as the instrumentality under God to which the American people should sing pæans of praise for all time to come.

My criticism of the honorable Senator's speech of yesterday was a reply to that. I do not understand that we have ever had any contest over a 3 per cent. bond but once. I was simply relating my votes and giving the honorable Senator information as to what my position was upon the 3 per cent. bond, which position he had misstated (unintentionally of course). I then stated that I believed it was for the best interest of this country to make that bond a twenty or thirty year bond, bearing 3 per cent. interest, the lowest rate of interest at which this Government or any other upon this earth can hope to float a public debt. Therefore I favored it.

Now, Mr. President, I do not understand that because I favored a 3 per cent. thirty-year bond I was in accord with the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] at that time, who favored a different bond.

Mr. VEST. You were with the Senator from Ohio on the Carlisle amendment?

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not mean to discuss with the honorable Senator all the amendments that were brought in by way of a betterment in the opinion of some Senators here to the 3 per cent. bond bill. I will not discuss with him the Carlisle amendment or any other amendment. There were more than a dozen amendments presented here, most of which, I think, were rejected.

Mr. VEST. The Carlisle amendment was adopted.

Mr. McPHERSON. Now the honorable Senator goes further and he must bring in the tariff issue as one of the questions, and cites my position on that. He wishes to know if I desire to perpetuate the public debt, and if I wish to heap up a large surplus of money in the public Treasury. It is unnecessary that I should answer that question "yes" or "no," but I will answer the Senator's question. I would not perpetuate the public debt to serve the national-banks, but for quite a different reason.

For two long years there had been an agitation of the tariff question in Congress. It had been determined, and wisely I think, that a commission outside of this body should be appointed by the President, who should have charge of and who should investigate every matter of interest, every matter of detail in relation to all the industries of the country, as to the effect about the public revenue, and also as to their workings with each other. The commission was appointed; for six long months it sat at various points all over this country, and took the testimony of those engaged in manufacturing, agricultural, and all other pursuits, giving to us a vast fund of information. They reported their bill to Congress, and the Congress of the United States accepted that report as a basis for settling the tariff question. What was it expected to accomplish? It was maintained by myself, I know, and I think also by other Senators on this floor, that it would save something like $75,000,000 per year to the people. It was intended to be a reduction of revenue, and it was voted for with that understanding and with that belief. The bill was better in its proportions, it was better in its classification, it was better in every respect than the old tariff law which we were seeking to amend. It is true I voted for it, and why? The bill did not suit me; I would have made a tariff bill far different to be in consonance with my own views; but I was met and confronted with this condition of things: The bill was before the Senate, the vote was being called; thirty-one Senators voted in opposition to the bill, thirty-one in favor of it. I rose in my place and cast my vote for the bill, as I would do again under the same circumstances.

For two long years we held the industries of this country in continued agitation. They did not know from one day to the other how much each industry would be affected by reason of legislation here. It takes a long period of time between the purchase of the raw material and the time required to manufacture for market certain kinds of goods. The manufacturer refused to purchase supplies for more than daily wants. The laborer had no assurance he would not be turned out and the next day become a tramp seeking bread from door to door. What I wanted to prevent, what my vote did prevent, was such a shock to the industries of this land that they would not have recovered from it in years. That is what it prevented, and that is what my vote will always seek to prevent, whether it be in the direction of giving needed facilities to national banks or to any industry which depends for its success upon the legislation of Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I had no purpose to discuss this question as long as the debate seemed to be confined to the measure proposed by the Finance Committee; but the debate has taken so wide a range and the amendments to this bill are so numerous and so voluminous that I think it proper for me to occupy a few moments by way of explanation of the votes I intend to give.

I am not troubled about the bill presented by the Finance Committee, nor am I disturbed with regard to any of the amendments proposed in the nature of enlarging the authority given to national banks in the way of the deposit of bonds. I do not fear the great calamity which some appear to think is impending upon the country if this bill be passed. I do not believe there is any panic impending with reference to our currency. I see no reason for it because of the deposit of 3 per cent. bonds by the banks and the probability that the notes issued on those bonds may be withdrawn from circulation by reason of the payment of the bonds. There may be a temporary disturbance in our currency on this account; but certainly I see no tendency to a general disturbance of our finances because of it. Our circulation does not depend wholly upon the national banks. It is true their issues constitute an important element in the circulation, and it is one of the elastic elements in our circulation. The only fixed element in our circulation to-day is the greenback. That can neither be increased nor diminished; but with reference to every other species of paper money there is no reason why the volume may not be increased or diminished at the will or caprice of commerce or of individuals who may desire to increase or diminish it. Take our silver certificates; are they not an important element in the paper circulation of our country? They amount now to $100,000,000, in round numbers. They may be diminished by their deposit in the Treasury. Our gold certificates, amounting to $100,000,000 or more, are in the same position. These gold certificates are diminished by their return to the Treasury and the taking of gold from the Treasury which may be hoarded or may go into circulation. So of the national-bank notes. A bank in Iowa or in Missouri with $100,000 capital may, if it chooses, return its $90,000 of circulation or may deposit greenbacks for it in the Treasury, and to that extent there is a withdrawal of $100,000 of circulation; but while that is being done in Missouri or in Iowa, a bank in Indiana may be taking out $100,000 of circulation either upon the capital already in existence or upon new capital that it proposes to use in banking. So that our currency is to-day flexible with reference to everything excepting the greenback; there is no flexibility in that regard.

The United States Government has taken into its hands the entire paper circulation of the country. There is to-day no power in our States to issue paper money, for the reason that we have imposed a tax of 10 per cent. upon State bank circulation. In other words, we have taken absolute control of the currency of the country. Now what is our duty, that being an existing fact? It is our duty to so manage this currency as to give the people of the country a sufficiency of the circulating medium to transact the business of our country from time to time.

When the national-banking system was established it was established in connection with our greenbacks, then having a larger volume than now, but the national-bank circulation was then limited to $300,000,000, beyond which the banks could not go. So valuable was that privilege then that in many instances a premium was paid for the notes of national banks that surrendered their charters, their notes being still in circulation; but when we made national banking free there was no longer any premium upon national-bank notes surrendered or to be surrendered to the Treasury; but another difficulty intervened, and what is that? It is that we have made here an iron-clad rule with reference to national-bank note circulation and the security upon which it shall be based, namely, that nothing but United States bonds shall be deposited with the Treasury and national circulation issued upon them alone. What is the result of that? We have been paying our national debt in the last few years at the rate of $100,000,000 per annum. It has now been paid to such an extent that it is exceedingly difficult for national banks to purchase bonds in order to place them as security for circulation.

Our 4 per cent. bonds have gone to 23 per cent. premium; our 4½ percents are to be paid in 1891; our 3 percents are payable at the pleasure of the Government; and every man with a nose upon his face knows and sees that the 3 percents will be paid in the course of three or four years from this time. Thus, while we have nominally made national banking free we have restricted the security by our own legislation whereby banks can secure these notes; and it is for the reason that this restriction has operated, by the fact that these securities, the bonds of the United States, are being paid, that I have been willing to vote for the bill of the Senator from Delaware, and to vote for the amendments proposed by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Vermont. I am willing to open up to the largest possible degree the bonds of the United States for the benefit, not of these banks, but for the benefit of the circulation of the country which we have required by our laws that these national banks shall issue. So I can vote for any of these amendments without difficulty.

Nor am I disturbed about fluctuation in the value of the national-bank notes. Why, Mr. President, the value of a national-bank note does not depend absolutely upon the bond deposited; it depends upon many other things. The United States Government stands behind every one of these national-bank notes, aside from the security which the Government holds. There is not a national-bank note in circulation today that this Government is not just as much bound to redeem as its own greenback notes. The faith of the Government is pledged to the redemption of every dollar of national-bank notes that is issued. Therefore, if by any operation, if by any sudden depression in the value of our securities, the bonds should fall below by 1 or 2 or 10 per cent. the amount of notes in circulation, the noteholder would not be disturbed by it; he would receive the value of his circulation by simply applying to the Treasury of the United States in case of default of the bank, because under our law the United States Government has bound itself when a bank fails to pay its notes to the holders dollar for dollar, and the Government itself, and not the noteholder, looks to the bank for its security. Therefore there is no danger in any one of these propositions of a fluctuation in the value of the circulating notes; they are absolutely secure in the hands of the holders. So I can vote for the amendment suggested by the Senator from Vermont without any difficulty. There is no danger of fluctuation in the value of these circulating notes; they are just as secure as the silver certificate, as the gold certificate, or as the greenback itself.

Now, Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Kansas and with other Senators, that this bill is a makeshift; it is a temporary expedient. We all know that it is only a question of time when these national banks will go out of existence, so far as their power to issue circulating notes is concerned, because they can not last beyond the period when our national debt shall be paid off. They will not last so long, because before then it will be impossible for national banks to secure United States bonds for the purposes of circulation. Why do I say so? The savings-banks and trust companies of our country already hold, as stated by the Comptroller of the Currency, about $250,000,000 of our bonds, largely the 4 per cent. bonds. Is it supposable that these trust companies and savings-banks will relinquish these bonds to national banks? Individuals in this country probably hold $100,000,000 more of the bonds, and one hundred or two hundred millions are possibly held abroad. So, then, of the $700,000,000 of 4 percents that run to 1907, in my judgment it is not probable or possible that more than $300,000,000 could be at any time secured for the purpose of national-bank circulation. The 3 percents that are now outstanding will be paid off, in the very nature of things, in three or four years, unless we largely reduce taxation. If we maintain the sinking fund only, the 3 per cent. bonds will be paid off in six years, before the maturity of the 4½ per cent. bonds.

So then it is only a question, in my judgment, of six or seven years when practically the national banks will cease to furnish circulation to the country, even if the measure proposed by the Senator from Vermont or that reported by the Senator from Delaware shall pass. Therefore I agree with those who say that it is our duty to address ourselves to the question of furnishing some other method whereby the circulation of our country can be maintained, rather than to rely wholly and only upon the bonds of the United States for that purpose. I am willing, for one, to address myself to that question with reference to the preservation of the national banks. I believe they are the most valuable moneyed institutions for the purpose of making exchanges among our people and transacting the banking business of our country that we have had in this nation. Therefore I am for maintaining the system, and I am for addressing myself to some measure or method whereby the system can be maintained.

Now, of the two propositions not yet noticed by me, the one presented by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and the one presented by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], I should greatly prefer the measure suggested by the Senator from Alabama. His proposition looks to the preservation and expansion and extension of the national banking system, keeping in mind constantly the absolute security of the noteholder; but the proposition of the Senator from Kansas and the correlative proposition of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] look to the absolute destruction of the national banking system, and if the principle of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas shall prevail, the national banking system is doomed, and I think, for one, that it is too valuable to be disturbed either now or in the future.

The Senator from Kansas proposes that the Government of the United States shall itself issue all the paper money of the country (for that is the ultimate effect of his proposition), and that it shall do so upon the sole security of the faith of the United States for the redemption of that money, and of 25 per cent. or 30 per cent. of coin, as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] suggests, by way of a reserve. I do not care to go into that question in detail, but I find in the details of this proposition some things which I can not assent to.

Some Senator the other day in the debate asked how these Treasury notes, so called, were to be put into circulation. I was glad that the Senator from Missouri undertook to answer that question. He told us in the first place that these bonds of ours were likely to rapidly increase in value, and he indorsed the suggestion, made I believe by Mr. L. E. Chittenden, that it would be only a few months or a few years at most when the 4 per cent. bonds would be worth 138½ in the markets of our country. And the Senator from Missouri proposes, as a means of getting these Treasury notes into circulation, that we shall go into the markets of the country and buy up the bonds from the holders at the market price. In other words, if the bonds shall go up to 138½ he proposes to obligate this Government to pay $138.50 for each $100 it owes to-day—no, not pay, but substitute another obligation of the Government of the United States of $138.50 for each Government obligation of $100 that the Government now owes to the people. In other words, he proposes, so far as the 4 per cent. bonds are concerned, to swell the public debt of the United States from two to three hundred million dollars. Is the Senate ready, are the people of the United States ready, to increase their obligations in that way, first by artificial legislation to enhance the value of the bonds in the markets of the world, and then go into the markets and buy up the bonds with other obligations of the United States? And yet there is no other way whereby these Treasury notes can be put into circulation.

I have here a statement of the condition of the Treasury on the 1st of this month. It shows that we have in the Treasury of the United States $486,000,000 of money. Think of it! Four hundred and eighty-six million dollars of money now in the Treasury, and yet the Senator from Missouri and I am sorry to say my friend from Kansas propose that we shall put into this Treasury an additional sum equivalent to whatever amount of bank circulation may be retired.

Mr. COCKRELL. May I ask a question about the $486,000,000 in the Treasury? Is there anything out representing any of it or is that absolutely surplus cash?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the gross sum of the assets.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not need to instruct my illustrious friend from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] upon that question. He knows perfectly well that there are obligations of the Government against this sum amounting to a good many millions of dollars. I believe the available assets are only $150,000,000, after taking from the gross amount of money in the Treasury the actual demands outstanding against it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wanted that to appear.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] in the same breath arguing in favor of putting these vast sums in the Treasury for the purpose of buying up bonds at 38½ per cent. premium, to which he says they will mount, tells us now that we have $100,000,000 of surplus per annum in the Treasury. So we have had, and perhaps during the past year even more than that; so we may have during the next year; I do not know. I know that from the computations of the Secretary of the Treasury we shall only have about $38,000,000 of surplus if we carry out our obligation to redeem a sufficient amount of bonds to protect the sinking fund as the law now requires.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] proposes this method of getting rid of these national-bank notes; but there is another system of expansion which goes on under his amendment and goes on under the amendment of my friend from Kansas illimitably; that is to say, there is no limit in either amendment to the amount of national-bank notes that may be issued. While one bank is withdrawing its circulation and Treasury notes are being issued in lieu of it, another and a new bank may get circulation or an old bank may still enlarge its circulation, so that the national-bank circulation may not be diminished one dollar, and yet we may have a large issue of Treasury notes.

Mr. President, I do not care to argue these questions at length——

Mr. BECK. Before the Senator from Iowa takes his seat I desire to obtain information from him, if he will be kind enough to give it to me, and I ask it in good faith, because I am troubled about it.

The Senator from Kansas provides that the Treasury notes which he proposes to issue shall be deposited in the Treasury and paid out like other moneys kept for the discharge of the obligations of the Government. That, of course, means to buy bonds, as, having a surplus of over $100,000,000 a year, we do now. I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa if he understands the amendment as I do in this way: If the national banks see fit to draw in all their circulation, say $300,000,000, and $300,000,000 of Treasury notes are issued, and of course $300,000,000 of bonds purchased, or the amount of bonds that $300,000,000 Treasury notes will purchase, and the national banks should afterward at any time reissue their $300,000,000 of circulation, does he understand that the $300,000,000 Treasury notes proposed by the Senator from Kansas would remain outstanding? I do.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand it to be so. I understand the Senator from Kansas now proposes no limitation on national-bank circulation as to volume. He had an amendment looking to that, I believe, last evening, but that amendment has been withdrawn. That amendment was a sort of Procrustean bed. It required that the total volume of circulation should neither be diminished nor increased at any time, assuming of course that we should want as much currency in the country in the winter months as we should in the summer and fall months, when business all over the country requires a larger circulation than perhaps at this season of the year.

But, Mr. President, as I said before, I do not think it worth while now to go into a detailed argument with reference to the public policy involved in the measure suggested by the Senator from Kansas. It is enough for us to say that all history, all experience is against the proposition suggested by his amendment. I know of no government that has ever undertaken in the form proposed by him to issue the currency of the country. The Senator from Missouri undertook to justify it yesterday by the suggestion that we have repeatedly issued Treasury notes. So we have issued them; but if the Senator will recur to the history of those issues he will see that such notes have always been issued in limited amounts, and I believe almost universally issued as exchequer bills are issued by Great Britain, bearing interest. So far as I know there never has been an exception to this rule, except possibly in 1814 or 1815, when a few small notes were authorized to be issued by our Government not bearing interest, but those notes were convertible into 7 per cent. bonds of the United States. I defy my friend from Missouri to furnish to me a single instance where the Government of the United States has ever issued Treasury notes except to be redeemed in short periods of time, and except also bearing interest at some fixed rate in the law which authorized their issue, and to meet current and pressing obligations of the Government. They were first issued in 1812 or 1813, when specie payments were suspended and when the business of this country was paralyzed because of a war with Great Britain; and some subsequent issues were made during that same period. They were again issued in the panic of 1837, but only for a short period of time, when our Treasury, as we know, was depleted by the distribution of the surplus money among the States of the Union, and again in 1842 and 1857 and 1860 and 1861 under the pressure of the Treasury for the purpose of paying the current pressing obligations of the Government. So when demand notes to the extent of $50,000,000 were issued in the beginning of the war in 1861 they were made convertible by their terms into 6 per cent. bonds, and they were taken up within a short period of time when we entered upon the experiment of issuing greenback legal-tender notes.

Our own experience shows us that the statesmen who have managed the finances of our Government from its organization, from the establishment of the Constitution to the present time, although we have at various periods been under great stress and stringency, have never proposed the suggestions of the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Missouri. In 1791, when this Government was pressed down with a load of debt, not only the debt of the States in the aggregate but the separate State debts arising out of the Revolutionary war, and when such men as Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Jefferson and General Washington busied their minds with considering what were the best and wisest methods of disposing of those debts, it never entered their fertile brain to adopt the suggestions of the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Missouri. They were, it is true, familiar with the experience of the experiment that our forefathers went through during the Revolutionary war with this character of irredeemable currency; they had seen the currency jump from par to a rate requiring $500 of it to buy one dollar of good money. So it has been during all the periods of pressure through which we have passed, no resort has been had to the experiment now sought to be revived.

How was it in 1862? I see Senators before me who participated in the discussions of what was then known as the issue of greenback currency, who declared then that that currency would not be redeemed. What was their argument? That it would be expanded under the pressure of the war to an irredeemable extent, and then would not be redeemed; and but for the fact that the men who controlled public affairs during the period from 1861 to 1865 determined that our legal-tender notes should never pass beyond a certain fixed sum (which was specified in the act of 1864), we should have launched out into a system of irredeemable paper money. We did not do it, and the result has been that the greenback currency of ours is to-day within the limits and means of our Government for redemption and payment, and is now at par in gold. Every form of obligation which was issued during the war, save and except the greenback currency, then in volume $400,000,000, was an interest-bearing obligation and redeemable at a short time fixed in the law which created it.

Now I submit to Senators whether when we are at specie payments when we have to-day in this country at least $800,000,000 of coin, gold and silver, when we have a currency every dollar of which is at par with the gold coin of the United States, when we have in the Treasury not only enough money to bear our ordinary expenses and pay our interest and provide for the sinking fund, but have over and beyond all this a surplus of $50,000,000 per annum to apply upon the public debt, which has not matured but is payable at the option of the Government, is it worth while for us to create still more paper obligations simply for the purpose of bridging over what may be called a temporary difficulty which I do not see, and thus change entirely the policy of our Government from its organization up to the present moment?

It may be that that will be considered a wise thing for us to do. I do not believe it ever will be, but it certainly is not a wise thing for us to enter upon at this moment when our Treasury is full to repletion, and when we have no earthly reason for the issue of these obligations except (as the Senator from Missouri himself confessed) to buy the interest-bearing obligations of our Government at a premium of 38½ per cent. Of course I am arguing upon the assumption that the 3 per cent. bonds which are payable at the pleasure of the Government must be exhausted before this machine is placed in full play.

Mr. President, I think we are bound to address ourselves in the near future to the question of substituting some other security than that of the United States bonds for the notes of the national banks. I have no doubt that a measure can be devised which will be perfectly safe to the bill-holder, perfectly secure to the Government of the United States, and yet furnish a flexible and elastic currency for the circulation of the country beyond that which would naturally come from the greenback notes and the gold and silver certificates.

I do not wish to take my seat without entering my protest against one suggestion that was made by the Senator from Missouri yesterday, quoting as I believe he did from the Senator from Ohio, and that is that there is no value in the provision giving the legal-tender quality to the greenback currency of the United States. I believe there is value in that provision, not now when we are in a high tide of prosperity, not now when no panic is pending, but let the time come when there is a stringency in the money market in this country, and when it does come it will be of immense value to the people of the United States who live remote from the great centers of gold and business to have a paper money of the Government in limited quantity that is itself a legal tender.

This legal-tender quality now fixed by our laws is fixed in analogy to the laws of Great Britain. They have allowed the Bank of England to issue without other security than the faith of the Government of Great Britain a certain limited quantity of Bank of England notes which are a legal tender throughout the kingdom, and experience has shown that in every panic since the establishment of the Bank of England upon this principle in 1844 not a single Bank of England note has been returned to the bank, but that these Bank of England notes have been used by people all over England and Scotland and Ireland for the purpose of protecting themselves against demands for actual coin payment of debts. So I think the time may come, I do not know when, when it will be of use to the United States to have a limited amount of legal-tender money; but I think that amount should be carefully limited. It is carefully limited now to $346,000,000, and I would not go one dollar beyond that under any circumstances whatever.

I know there is a question pending in the Supreme Court of the United States as to the power of the Government under existing law to reissue the greenbacks from time to time when they have been redeemed or paid into the Treasury. If the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Missouri and other Senators be correct, then it matters not to the people of the United States how that case is decided.

Mr. MAXEY. I beg to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa, if he will permit me, to one point he has made. He states that the Bank of England is authorized by the government to issue a certain amount of Bank of England notes, which are a legal tender throughout the kingdom. That is true; but is it not also true that when that same Bank of England note is presented at the bank the bank must pay it in coin?

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MAXEY. Very well; that is the point.

Mr. ALLISON. I have been accurate in my statement.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator says there is an additional value given to United States notes by virtue of their being a legal tender. So long as our Treasury is bound like the Bank of England to redeem its greenbacks in gold as it is now, what additional value is given by the legal-tender quality?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know that I fully understand the Senator's question.

Mr. MAXEY. It is this: The Bank of England note, while a legal tender throughout the kingdom, must be paid in coin, in gold, according to their law, when presented at the bank's counter. The Senator says the greenback has additional value given to it here by virtue of its being a legal tender. We have a law requiring the Treasury to redeem that greenback in coin when presented. So long as that law lasts, I ask what additional value is given to the greenback by virtue of its having a legal-tender quality?

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the Senator.

Mr. MAXEY. In other words, it is its convertibility that makes it valuable, and not its legal-tender quality, for if that was true would it not have been good in 1865, 1866, and 1867, when not convertible, as well as to-day when it is convertible?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I was not for the moment aware that my critical friend from Texas was listening to my remarks——

Mr. MAXEY. Very attentively.

Mr. ALLISON. If I had been aware of that fact I would have been more accurate in my statement. I should have said that the Bank of England note was a legal-tender everywhere except at the bank. But the Senator will remember that during the panics of 1847 and 1857 and 1866 in Great Britain not a single Bank of England note was returned to the bank for payment. In other words, the gold that was in the issue department of the Bank of England remained there, and so the gold would remain, in my judgment, in time of a panic, in the Treasury of the United States which is held there for the redemption of the greenbacks.

I will put a case, which is suggested to me by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. I live in Dubuque, Iowa, and my friend lives in Texas; there is a panic, and we hold greenbacks; if we are a bank or a commercial house, our creditors pushes us. It is no answer to say to him, "As soon as I can send my greenbacks to Washington and express the gold back, at an immense cost to me, I will pay you your debt." He says, "I want my debt now; your money, your coin." The greenback is a tender then and there, and thus it becomes of immense value in times of panic.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator will permit me to reply to that. In 1865 and so on up to 1879 the greenbacks were at a discount as compared with gold. The national-bank notes were correspondingly at a discount as compared with gold. The Senator contends that the greenback is given additional value by the legal-tender quality. I ask him during all that time was the greenback worth on the market one solitary farthing more than the national-bank bill, which was not a legal tender?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, it was worth more. It was worth more as a matter of course because the greenback was the gold of our country, it was a legal tender, but a national-bank bill was not a tender except for debts due the bank issuing it.

Mr. MAXEY. Did anybody ever make a particle of difference in the reception of money for a debt or for any purpose whatever between a national-bank bill and a greenback bill?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not suppose any one did. I am not discussing ordinary periods of time. I agree with the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Ohio that in ordinary times it matters not with reference to the question of legal-tender; but I am speaking of times of stringency; I am speaking of a time when the creditor class naturally, if it has the power, will grind the debtor class; and therefore it was that I was astonished to find Senators on that side of the Chamber and on this saying that there was no additional quality given to the greenbacks by virtue of the legal-tender provision.

Mr. President, while upon that subject I will say a word more, and that is that if we are to do anything with a view of relieving a contemplated or a possible stringency we should do it in some other way than that proposed by the Senator from Kansas. I would say that the Secretary of the Treasury at such a time might reduce the balance in the Treasury below what it is ordinarily kept at, one hundred and forty to one hundred and fifty millions, which I believe is the ordinary amount of reserve in the Treasury. I am one of those who believe that $100,000,000 is an ample reserve for the redemption and for the maintenance of the redemption of all the greenback currency in existence. I do not believe it is necessary to hold a reserve of 40 per cent. for that purpose. All the experience of other countries discloses the fact that it is not this kind of currency, legal-tender currency, that is called in in time of stringency. It is the money that is not a legal tender that is called in at such times. Therefore if there was flexibility anywhere in time of panic or time of trouble, it should be in the Secretary of the Treasury, who could at such times relieve the money market by letting the money go out of the Treasury. Sotto voce my friend from California [Mr. MILLER] says to me truly that there is no law requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to hold any specific sum. It is now perfectly within the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to relieve a stringent money market in time of panic by unloosing some of the money which has been held there for years as a reserve for the benefit of the greenback currency.

So, Mr. President, I am not alarmed with reference to what will take place even if none of these bills shall pass. I believe, not in the interest of the banks but in the interest of an easy and flexible circulating medium, that it is a perfectly safe proposition to allow these banks instead of receiving 90 per cent. on the par value of their bonds to receive full par value on their bonds; and I believe it is perfectly safe to allow them to receive within 10 per cent. of the market value of their bonds at this time or always; and therefore it is that, not for the benefit of the banks, but for the purpose of keeping our circulation good and strong by offering an inducement to the banks to deposit bonds, I am perfectly willing to vote for the measure reported by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] and also the amendment suggested by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I am not going to make a long speech. I asked the Senator from Iowa a question relative to this amendment which I propose to say a word about. Preliminary to that I desire to observe that there has been a good deal of sharp criticism in regard to those of us who reported this bill from the Finance Committee. I am not particularly solicitous about answering suggestions that I belong to the banks, or that I am a serf of the banks, or a follower of any set of men, however powerful. I do not think anybody who knows me really suspects me of belonging to a bank or anybody else. Therefore I do not care anything about such suggestions.

I assumed that this question was submitted to the Finance Committee because the Secretary of the Treasury had told Congress that the bonds of the United States were being purchased by him so rapidly by reason of the great surplus of revenue that something had to be done. He suggested the passage of a bill much more favorable to the banks than that reported by us. None of the amendments now proposed looking to the issue of Treasury notes or to the devising of a new system of banking as a substitute for national banks was then suggested by any one as far as I knew. No such bill was referred to us, no amendment was before the committee looking in that direction, and I supposed that all we had to do relative to the bill submitted was to see how we could best avoid the serious difficulty relative to the contraction of currency by the too rapid withdrawal of the bonds on which it was based, until we could have an opportunity to reduce taxation so as to avoid the collection of the immense surplus which we are collecting under existing laws.

Looking to that end and that only, I agreed to the bill as reported. I endeavored when I spoke the other day to show the Senate that we had already reduced the public debt far beyond all the requirements of the sinking fund, that we were not acting wisely if we authorized the Secretary to buy at any premium he saw fit to give bonds not yet due, but that our true course was to address ourselves to giving the people relief from the burdens of taxation. That course the Secretary of the Treasury had told us in his report was a necessity; and if he had not, our own common sense ought to dictate it. In the mean time, as there was a likelihood of trouble in regard to the circulation of the banks, we had to determine, under the bill referred to us, how we could in the easiest way, doing the least possible damage, or if you please the most possible good, continue the banking system until some better system might be carefully devised to take its place, if that should at any time be deemed advisable. A majority of the committee agreed that the wisest thing to do was, as the outstanding bonds were all good for their face value at least, as we had received par for them all and expected to pay them all at par, and as the 3 percents were now payable, and, as I said the other day, had been reduced from 6 and 5 per cent. by a sort of coercion to the present rate, to say we would allow bank circulation to the full amount of their face value, instead of 90 per cent. as now provided by law.

That seemed to me to be a measure that until we could act carefully in regard to a permanent system would do nobody any particular harm and might bridge over the present crisis. I still think it will accomplish our purpose. That is about "the head and front of my offending," and as far as I know of those with whom I agreed in reporting this bill. I do not belong to any bank—I never suspected that anybody would think I did—because I propose that measure in lieu of the original bill. I repeat that I am not looking to the interest of any bank or banking system particularly in supporting that measure.

I was not called upon to devise a new banking system or decide between the merits of this system and any other system. I was called upon to say how we could provide for an emergency until Congress in its wisdom should decide how best to reduce taxation, and how to avoid the rapid withdrawal of the bonds of the United States beyond the point necessary for the safe transaction of the business of the country. That is all I care to say in regard to the criticisms on those of us who support the bill of the committee. I am entirely content to stand on the speech I made the other day. Now we are met by the proposition of the Senator from Kansas, which seems to me to provide for a permanent and it may be rapid inflation of the currency, whether the wants of business require it or not.

Not content with purchasing the bonds of the United States to the amount of $145,000,000 as we did the year before last, as we did with the surplus revenue we had beyond the wants of the Government, or with the reduction of the principal of the debt, $132,000,000 last year, or with the reduction of $65,000,000 in the seven past months of this year, we are now told, notwithstanding $212,000,000 of gold and silver certificates have been added to our circulation in the last few years, if any banking corporation sees fit to curtail its circulation from any cause, Treasury notes must be issued for an equal amount, whether needed by the country or not. To illustrate the principle by an extreme case, suppose all the banking corporations see fit to withdraw their currency, we must issue Treasury notes to the extent that they withdraw it; it might amount to $300,000,000; of course $300,000,000 more of United States Treasury notes must issue; we can only give them circulation by buying bonds with them. The trouble now is that we are buying bonds too rapidly out of the taxes collected by our present tariff and internal-revenue laws. Why should we change the character of our debt merely, as this amendment proposes, when we are paying it off absolutely from our redundant revenues too rapidly?

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. COKE. Suppose the banks do withdraw the $300,000,000, what is now to take the place of that currency? What can you do about it?

Mr. BECK. I thought I showed conclusively the other day that we had been greatly relieved in that regard by the issue of gold and silver certificates, which have run up to $212,000,000 already. Let me ask, suppose the banks do withdraw their notes and we issue $300,000,000 of Treasury notes, have we not to buy outstanding bonds at any premium any holder may see fit to ask for them, $300,000,000 of bonds or as many bonds as $300,000,000 of Treasury notes will obtain, in order to put out the notes at all? And then suppose the same or other national banks in thirty days may demand again the $300,000,000 of bank circulation to be reissued to them, as they have a right to do, by the deposit of bonds, have you not got then an inflation of the currency of $300,000,000 and no reduction of the debt—simply a substitution of one form of debt for another; and are you not providing for a possible condition of things more intolerable than any which any of the other amendments, bad as they are, can bring about? You do not stop the national banks from taking out as much circulation as they please or think they can make money out of at any time after you have taken advantage of the temporary withdrawal to issue Treasury notes and buy in with them our own bonds at 40 per cent. premium, it may be, or even more.

Mr. COKE. Can the banks take out currency without buying bonds? Suppose the Government is paying a very heavy premium for bonds, the banks as a matter of course must also pay a very heavy premium for bonds in order to get more currency.

Mr. BECK. The bonds of the United States that are outstanding amount, the fours to $736,000,000; the four-and-a-halfs to $250,000,000; the currency sixes to $67,000,000, saying nothing of those now due. Circulation can be demanded to-day upon every one of these bonds by banking organizations. I do not care whether the banks buy them now or whether they originally bought them at par. It is immaterial how they got them, whenever they find that they can make money out of circulation they will use the bonds to obtain currency. Individuals holding bonds can associate themselves to the number of five, organize national banks, and take out circulation to the amount of 90 per cent. of every bond outstanding to-day. And after you have, under the delusion that you are preventing contraction, issued $300,000,000 Treasury notes and bought at any premium the outstanding bonds and thereby increased the currency to that amount without canceling the debt, you do not deprive by any scheme presented any five men in the United States who hold bonds, no matter what they paid for them or how they got them, from demanding currency on them whenever they form a banking organization. That is what this amendment proposes to allow, and it is about all it proposes, as I understand it.

Whether the country needs it or not, you would force by this amendment, if the supposed condition of things existed, $300,000,000 of United States Treasury notes to be issued and bonds purchased; the same principle would govern no matter what proportion of bank circulation is withdrawn. The currency of the national banks may be decreased temporarily because the country does not want that currency at the time; it would doubtless be increased again as soon as it was profitable; and in the face of that temporary surrender, because the country would not borrow it, you assume by law that there is a demand for more currency, and force the United States, when the country may not need them, to issue as many million dollars of Treasury notes as the national banks see fit to withdraw bank circulation, and force the Secretary to buy bonds at any premium, when we all admit that our bonds are being purchased too rapidly now. You do not reduce the debt at all, simply convert it. You reduce the interest, but you have paid a heavy premium beyond the interest to get it within your control.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. PUGH. I understand that under the amendment of the Senator from Kansas there can be no issue of Treasury notes except when the bank notes are withdrawn on the payment of the bonds by the Government; and if the bonds are paid by the Government, where are there any to be purchased with these Treasury notes? That is a complete answer to the Senator's apprehension in reference to the operation of the amendment.

Mr. BECK. The national banks can withdraw their bonds without their being purchased by the Government and surrender their currency without the title to their bonds being changed. So the fact upon which the Senator from Alabama starts is not correctly stated.

Mr. PUGH. They can only withdraw $3,000,000 per month under the operation of the banking law; and under the amendment of my friend from Kansas there can be no issue of Treasury notes except upon the satisfaction of the bonds by the Government.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon; that is not so. Here is the amendment:

That whenever the circulation of any national bank, or any portion thereof, shall be surrendered.

That does not mean a payment of the bonds at all.

Mr. MORGAN. Allow me——

Mr. BECK. One at a time. The Senator's colleague is now making an issue of fact with me, and he is proceeding upon a false basis. Whenever the bank circulation is surrendered "the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon issue an equivalent amount of Treasury notes of the denominations now provided by law for national-bank notes. Said Treasury notes shall be deposited in the Treasury and paid out as other moneys kept for the discharge of the obligations of the Government."

I was illustrating merely by an assumption of the withdrawal of the whole amount at once. As I observed before, the principle is the same as to any lesser amount. I repeat, there is no necessity for a single bond of the United States to be paid when the circulation is withdrawn by the national banks.

Mr. PUGH. The Treasury can not buy bonds unless with money in the Treasury. The Treasury notes are to be issued on the return of the bonds on the call of the Government, and when they are called they are paid.

Mr. BECK. The Senator has it all wrong.

Mr. PUGH. If there be no Treasury notes to buy bonds, what bonds can be bought after the payment of the 3 percents? The national banking law only allows a return of $3,000,000 of currency per month.

Mr. BECK. There were $135,000,000 of money placed in the Treasury last year, put there by tariff and internal-revenue taxation. That is the way the money gets into the Treasury, and it was with that surplus money thus obtained from taxation that bonds were bought. The surrender of national-bank circulation only restores the bonds to the banks depositing them. They go back to the owner and the circulation obtained upon them is canceled, and I would say to the Senator from Texas that that will only be done when business makes it necessary; but the United States under this amendment, when business did not make it necessary—when the banks may have retired it because the people did not want it, must issue a corresponding amount of Treasury notes to add to the already overflowing surplus and buy that many more bonds and put out Treasury notes whether the country wants them or not. That is the vice in the proposed amendment. The issue must be made, it may be, after gold and silver certificates have furnished all the currency the people need, and the Treasury notes must go out, not for the purpose of reducing the debt, and when business does demand them. Business interests regulate these things better than Congressional dictation. No matter what you do, the banks can take out as much currency as they please. Any five men holding the bonds can become bankers and take out circulation. You will simply have inflated the currency when the people did not want it, and you call everybody the slaves of the banks who do not agree with you and assume that you are wiser than everybody else. I differ with you; I think your policy wrong; but I do not call you hard names because you think differently from me, and I do not like to be called hard names myself because I do not see as other gentlemen think they see.

We have each to act according to the best lights before us. When I was asked as a member of the Finance Committee to see if we could not have taxation reduced by stopping this enormous purchase of bonds, and at the same time keep the currency in a reasonably certain condition, I thought the best thing to do was to present the bill we did, so that every bond and every circulating note based on it shall be equal and all good. That is all there is of it, Mr. President. I thought it was proper to say that much to make my position clear.

Mr. MORGAN. As I read the amendment of the Senator from Kansas——

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. MORGAN. In one moment. I merely wanted to state one fact about the pending proposition. As I read and understood the amendment of the Senator from Kansas it provided for the issue of Treasury notes whenever the national-banks should surrender their circulation in consequence of the payment of the bonds of the United States deposited to secure circulation.

Mr. BECK. Is that in the amendment?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I say that is the way I understood it.

Mr. BECK. It is not there.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, I propose to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas so as to put that in. My object in drawing the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to it was simply that I want to hear him argue it upon that hypothesis.

Mr. COKE. What is the amendment that the Senator from Alabama proposes?

Mr. MORGAN. I propose to provide that whenever any portion of the circulation of the national banks is surrendered in consequence of the call and payment of bonds by the United States Government, an equal amount of Treasury notes shall be issued by the Government in lieu thereof, so as to prevent the shrinkage of the circulation. Understanding that that was the real purport of the amendment, I desire to hear the Senator from Kentucky discuss it upon that hypothesis, because my mind is not made up about it, and I know that he, as well as any other member of the Finance Committee, ought to be enabled to enlighten the Senate and the country upon what would be the effect—the evil effect—of the issue of a limited amount of Treasury notes to correspond precisely with the amount of surrendered circulation of the national banks called in by the Government of the United States in consequence of the payment of bonds. I say that my mind is not made up on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas even with that put in; but that is the way I understand the amendment, and if that is not the way the Senator from Kansas understands it, I intend to test the question before the Senate by offering that as an amendment to the amendment, and let us have this question fairly and squarely out; for I should like to be informed, I should like to have my judgment convinced, as to whether this would be the initiation of a system for the breaking up entirely of the national banking system, or whether it would be in the nature of a relief to the circulating medium of the country against the evil effects of the shrinkage in that circulation caused by the payment of our national debt.

In common with a great many people of the United States, I might say millions of them, I have my heart steadily fixed upon the proposition of paying off the national debt. We have been working to that end assiduously for a long time, at great expense, and under very serious embarrassments, which I have very frequently detected in my brief experience of public affairs, and I do not want us now to turn back and to say we shall fix upon this country an interest-bearing debt for all time to come, a constant source of taxation and worry to the people, for the purpose of maintaining a circulation of paper money in this country. The Government of the United States ought not to be put in the category of being compelled to issue interest-bearing bonds and keep them in circulation and keep up taxation upon the people for the payment of the interest upon those bonds in order that it may be able to supply currency to the people. We certainly can find a better and a cheaper plan than that of doing it. We lived for many years, almost a century, without having to resort to such an expedient as this. The first time that we found the necessity for doing so was during a time of war, when our bonds were sinking and it was necessary to devise the national banking system and the funding of the national debt in order to float the bonds. Now the tables have turned, and we find it necessary to maintain a national debt amounting to perhaps a thousand millions for the purpose of floating the currency. That is not a thing that American statesmanship ought to pause at. We certainly have got wit and will enough, if we will look at these questions deliberately, to devise some system that is better than that; and I for one am in favor of approaching some better system in the gradual method than I think is indicated by the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

Mr. DAWES. I present also a petition signed by nearly all the members of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, by the president of its senate and the speaker of its house, which I desire may take the course that is usual for official memorials from the States. This is not official, but it is so nearly so that I ask that it may be read at the desk or printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts presents a petition of sundry members of the Legislature of that State and asks that the petition may be read. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and the petition will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the petition.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Massachusetts asked that the petition either be read or printed in the RECORD. If printing in the RECORD will be satisfactory to the Senator, I suggest that it be so printed without reading.

Mr. DAWES. I do not care about its being read if it can be printed in the RECORD so that it may be treated somewhat as an official paper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was unable to hear the request of the Senator from Massachusetts precisely as it appears from his statement now.

The Senator from Massachusetts asks that without reading the petition it may be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and it will be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The petition is as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

In order to accomplish a speedy, just, and economical solution of the Indian problem, the undersigned members of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts would respectfully but earnestly request your honorable body to execute such laws and make such appropriations as may secure to the Indian people of the United States—

First. General education.

BILLS RECOMMITTED.

Mr. MORRILL. The bill (S. 619) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make final adjustment of claims of certain foreign steamship companies arising from the illegal exaction of tonnage duties, was reported adversely yesterday from the Committee on Finance and indefinitely postponed. I move that the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered for the purpose of having the bill referred again to the Committee on Finance, for the reason that the parties in interest desire to submit to the committee papers and documents in relation to the same.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Mr. BECK. If there is no objection, as the bill relates to a subject we are now discussing in connection with the national banks and other matters and it is very short, I ask that it be read at length and printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has a right to have the bill read the second time at length.

Mr. BECK. I should be glad to have that done. The bill is very short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read the second time in extenso.

The bill was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That if at any time the revenues of the Government shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations made by Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to use so much of the cash balance remaining in the Treasury as may be necessary to make up the deficit as though it was money not otherwise appropriated, and he is further directed not to issue or sell bonds of the United States in order to obtain money to make up such deficit until the cash balance in the Treasury is reduced below $100,000,000.

Mr. VAN WYCK submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior inform the Senate when and how many acres of indemnity lands were certified or patented to railroad corporations in the State of Iowa to whom grants of public lands were donated; also whether any of said roads are now claiming more indemnity lands and what quantities.

TERMS OF IOWA COURTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" that order is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under the eighth rule.

Mr. ALLISON. Before proceeding with the Calendar, I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (H. R. 448) to fix the times for holding the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States in the northern district of Iowa. It will take but a moment to dispose of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa is entitled to move at this time, the morning business being through, to take the bill up.

Mr. ALLISON. I think there will be no objection to it.

Mr. HARRIS. Is it a matter of importance as a question of time?

Mr. ALLISON. It is a matter of importance as it respects the time of holding the courts. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 448) to fix the times for holding the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States in the northern district of Iowa.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMS FOR MILITIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar will be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 156) to amend section 1661 of the Revised Statutes making an annual appropriation to provide arms for the militia.

Mr. SEWELL. There is a report accompanying the bill which I should like to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. SEWELL January 22, 1884:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 156) "to amend section 1661 of the Revised Statutes making an annual appropriation to provide arms for the militia," respectfully report:

That an appropriation, fixed in 1808, to provide arms for seventeen States with a population of eight millions is inadequate to provide arms for thirty-eight States with a population of fifty millions needs no argument.

The Chief of Ordnance has for many years urged Congress to increase the appropriation, and bills for this purpose were favorably reported to the Senate by this committee in the Forty-fifth and Forty-seventh Congresses.

In the reports transmitted to this session of Congress the Chief of Ordnance again urges the matter, the Secretary of War concurs in his recommendations, and the President in his annual message commends it to Congress.

In connection with a favorable consideration of the proposition to increase the appropriation there are other points connected with it to which the committee deem it proper to call attention.

The existing law is very crude; it simply provides as follows:

"SEC. 1661. The annual sum of $200,000 is appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of providing arms and equipments for the whole body of the militia, either by purchase or manufacture, by and on account of the United States."

It will be perceived that no provision is made as to the mode of apportioning the appropriation between the States, no requirements for accountability for the property furnished, or limitation on the disposition that the States may make of it. The greatest defect of the law, however, is that it does not allow the furnishing of tents and other articles necessary to provide for camps of instruction. To this omission of the law is largely due the disparity between the different States in the strength and efficiency of the militia.

The bill under consideration provides for these defects in the existing law.

It is also proper to observe that while this bill increases the annual appropriation, it provides that such State shall be entitled to draw only such proportion of the amount apportioned to it as the actual number of its active militia bears to a specified maximum.

The Chief of Ordnance makes the following reference in his last report to the organization of the militia in the several States:

"It is difficult to realize the fact that more than half a generation has passed since the close of the war, and yet that simple fact has a vital bearing for weal or woe on the status of the militia and the arms-bearing force of the country. Recruits for the Army must be between 16 and 35 years of age at the time of their enlistment. In the militia every able-bodied male citizen who is of the age of 18 and under 45 years shall be enrolled. The war having lasted four years, the million of men in the service at its close must have been between the ages of 16 and 39—those at 16 being raw recruits, those at 39 being hardened veterans of many campaigns—the mean age being 28 in 1865; if to this be added the eighteen years since the war, the mean age of the soldiers mustered out at the end of the war would be 46 at the present time, an age about the maximum required for the militia. But even those who were 16 at the end of the war would now be 34, within one year of the maximum limit required for the Army. It thus appears that in another decade the last remnant of that grand army will have passed beyond the limit of active military service. All the field experiences of the greatest war of modern times will then be lost to the future, and the country's dependence will rest solely on a people whose success in war may have to be gained through reverses and disappointments.

"The remedy for this state of affairs is simple and plain. Substantial encouragement should be given to the formation of volunteer organizations in every State, district, and city, by liberal appropriations made by Congress to supply the arms, equipments, tents, ammunition, and other ordnance stores. A well-digested system of organization, and a proper recognition of successful efforts in enforcing strict discipline and perfect drill, would go far to keep such organizations in heart and in the confidence of the country.

"The act of 23d of April, 1808, makes an annual appropriation of $200,000 'for the purpose of providing arms and equipments for the whole body of the militia.' The bill (S. 1596) reported from the Senate Committee on Military Affairs during the last Congress is so liberal and important in its provisions that I venture to insert it here in full, in the hope that it may receive the attention it deserves. I strongly recommend the passage of such a law."

In recommending the passage of this bill the committee are of the opinion that no money could be appropriated by Congress more advantageously, in view of the fact that the regular Army, containing only 25,000 men, is scattered over the entire country, and especially in the Territories, so that, in cases of necessity for the rapid assemblage of a large force, reliance would have to be placed in the militia.

A number of the States now have thoroughly equipped, organized, and disciplined bodies of men, but this is done through annual appropriations made by the respective States, with the exception of the division of the present appropriation of $200,000 annually, which appropriation was a large one when originally made, but is now wholly insufficient to provide even arms for the militia of the several States.

This appropriation, as shown by the report of the Chief of Ordnance, is divided as follows:

Balance due to (or from) the States and Territories on ——— —, 188–, under the law for arming and equipping the militia.

The committee are of the further opinion that the increase of this appropriation to $600,000 will encourage the States not now taking an active part in the necessary work of thorough organization in their militia to do so, and that the benefits to be derived by the General Government will warrant the expenditure of the money.

Mr. MORRILL. I call the attention of the Senator having charge of the bill to the change that is proposed in the present bill from what has heretofore existed. I think that heretofore Federal numbers have always been considered in the distribution of arms. I notice by the bill that Senators are left out in the computation of the basis, and I ask him if he has any objection to inserting on line 15, page 2, the words "Senators and."

Mr. SEWELL. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I move to amend the bill by inserting in line 15, after the words "number of," the words "Senators and;" so as to read:

That said appropriation shall be apportioned among the several States and Territories on the books of the Ordnance Department by the Chief of Ordnance of the Army, under the direction of the Secretary of War, according to the number of Senators and Representatives or Delegates to which each State and Territory respectively is entitled in the Congress of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARLAND. The title should be amended to correspond with the text of the bill by inserting the words "and equipments."

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 1661 of the Revised Statutes, making an annual appropriation to provide arms and equipments for the militia."

ALEXANDER FRANCESCO.

The bill (S. 1033) giving a military record to Alexander Francesco, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to enter upon the rolls of Company D, Forty-fifth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, the name of Alexander Francesco, as a private, duly mustered into the service of the United States as of date October 24, 1863, and to complete his military record.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY L. WALKER AND ELLA WALKER.

The bill (S. 465) for the relief of Mary L. Walker and Ella Walker was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Mary L. Walker and Ella Walker, sole surviving daughters of Lieut. Col. Calvin Walker, late of the Thirty-third Regiment of New York State Volunteers, the pension granted by certificate No. 209900 to Calvin Walker, computing the amount due to the day of his death only.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. MITCHELL January 22, 1884:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 465) for the relief of Mary L. Walker and Ella Walker and petition therefor, having considered the same, report as follows:

That this case was considered by this committee at the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress, and report thereon (No. 963) made, as follows:

"The claimants, Mary L. Walker and Ella Walker, are the sole surviving daughters and children of Lieut. Col. Calvin Walker, late of the Thirty-third Regiment of New York Volunteers. Colonel Walker applied for a pension on account of disabilities received in the service and in the line of duty, and completed his proofs during his lifetime.

"The case in the Pension Office was submitted for admission on the 8th of May, 1882, and was subsequently allowed at the rate of $7.50 per month from the 4th day of October, 1861; but the certificate therefor was not issued until the 27th day of May, 1882. Colonel Walker died on the same day, and about four hours after the certificate in his case was issued as aforesaid. The Commissioner of Pensions construes the law governing the payment of pensions to be that the representatives of a pensioner, in case of death, are not entitled to receive the pension granted the decedent, unless the check for the amount allowed is received and indorsed by the pensioner.

"The committee are of the opinion, however, that in cases where the pension certificate has been actually issued before the death of the person found to be entitled to a pension, there is equity and justice in paying the amount so allowed to the needy children of the pensioner, as in the present case.

"The committee, upon a careful examination of all the facts bearing upon the case, deem it a deserving and meritorious one for special legislation."

The present bill is in the exact language of the one then reported.

Your committee, believing that the above report correctly sets forth the material facts in the case, adopt it, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN FRASER.

The bill (S. 830) for the relief of John Fraser was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the sum of $742.33 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment in full to John Fraser for services as Supervising Architect of the Treasury from December 6, 1878, to May 22, 1879.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear the report read in that case.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask that the bill go over without prejudice on the Calendar, as it is in charge of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and I propose to consult him about still another amendment. I ask that it remain on the Calendar without prejudice until his return.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to that as far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska ask that the bill stand to-morrow where it does to-day, the third from the top, or only that it be passed over?

Mr. VAN WYCK. That it be passed over without prejudice until the Senator from Massachusetts returns.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest that as the other call of the Calendar is so close, it will make no difference, it will soon be reached on that call.

Mr. CONGER. I hope this may retain its place on the Calendar. I do not see any reason why the bill should not be passed now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks that the bill be passed over, retaining its order in the daily call under the eighth rule.

Mr. CONGER. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS. The effect of that would be to allow the Senator to call it up on any day between the conclusion of the morning business and 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the request of the Senator from Michigan the effect would be that to-morrow morning it would stand at the head of the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that it be passed over to stand at the head of the Calendar to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this bill being passed over to stand at the head of the Calendar to-morrow morning? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

GEORGE H. CARLYLE.

The bill (S. 375) for the relief of George H. Carlyle was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRIS. There is an adverse report on that bill; let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

MAURICE GRIVOT.

The bill (S. 87) for the relief of the heirs of Maurice Grivot was announced as next in order.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the report be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. JACKSON January 23, 1880, from the Committee on Claims, but before concluding was interrupted by Mr. CONGER. That is a case which I think will require more discussion than is allowed under the five-minute rule. I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to and goes over.

MARY A. LEWIS.

The bill (S. 690) for the relief of Mary A. Lewis, widow of Joseph N. Lewis, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments.

The first amendment was, after the word "cents," in line 7, to strike out:

With interest thereon at 6 per cent. per annum from the 4th day of March, 1877, to date of payment.

So as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Mrs. Mary A. Lewis, widow of Joseph N. Lewis, the sum of $111.22; to be in full remuneration of the payment made by said Joseph N. Lewis out of his own private funds for account of the Government of the United States while he was acting as its commercial agent at Port au Prince, Hayti, in the year 1855.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the bill the following:

Provided, That the said Mary A. Lewis procure the release of the personal representative of the said Joseph N. Lewis and file the same in the Treasury of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

The bill (S. 158) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter was announced as next in order.

Mr. SEWELL. Pending the consideration of the House bill in the Committee on Military Affairs, I ask that this bill go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks that this bill go over without prejudice, by which the Chair understands is meant that it maintains its place at the head of the Calendar under the eighth rule. Is there objection?

Mr. CONGER. I would suggest to the Senator that this bill may as well go to its place under the other rule, for of course it can not come up without objection for discussion.

Mr. SEWELL. I will say that I expect not to call the bill up until the House bill is reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONGER. Let it go on the other docket and stay there.

Mr. SEWELL. The matter will in all probability be taken up by agreement any way.

Mr. CONGER. Let it go on the list under the ninth rule until some disposition be made of it.

Mr. HARRIS. I would suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that if his present request is agreed to his bill would stand second in the call of the Calendar under the eighth rule to-morrow morning and so on until finally disposed of. He had better transfer it to the Calendar under the ninth rule, where it would not be called for disposition every morning until finally acted upon.

Mr. SEWELL. That will be satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill is passed over.

ELLEN CALL LONG AND MARY K. BREVARD.

The bill (S. 1233) for the relief of Ellen Call Long and Mary K. Brevard was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $8,563.37 in satisfaction of the claim of Ellen Call Long and Mary K. Brevard, next of kin of R. K. Call, deceased, being the amount found in favor of R. K. Call in a suit by the United States against him.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. GEORGE January 23, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1233) for the relief of Mrs. Ellen Call Long and Mrs. Mary K. Brevard, respectfully report:

In the last Congress this committee made the following report, which they now adopt:

[Senate Report No. 532, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

This claim was adversely reported on by this committee in the Forty-second Congress and also in the Forty-third Congress. It was favorably reported in the Forty-sixth Congress. The last report, made by Mr. Hereford, is as follows, and contains a true statement of the facts:

[Senate Report No. 648, Forty-sixth Congress, second session.]

R. K. Call was for many years, more than ten, receiver of public moneys at Tallahassee, Fla. He died in 1862.

Your committee received the following letter from the office of the Secretary of the Treasury. The letter is from F. B. Streeter, a former Solicitor of the Treasury, to the then Secretary of the Treasury, James Guthrie, which fully sets forth all the facts in the case:

OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY,
February 19, 1856.

SIR: The letter of R. K. Call, dated the 10th ultimo, referred to this office for a report on the matter to which it relates, has been duly received; and in compliance with your directions I have the honor to state that it appears from the dockets and files of this office that suit was commenced in February, 1840, against Richard K. Call for the recovery of $5,907.53 alleged to be due from him as late receiver of public moneys at Tallahassee. This balance was subsequently reduced to $5,060.13. A separate suit was also commenced against his sureties. In defense General Call put in the pleas of nil debit, set-off, and payment. The suit against General Call was tried at February term, 1842, of the district court at Tallahassee, and a verdict rendered in his favor for $7,923.72. In his report of this trial the district attorney states, in a letter dated 8th March, 1842, "that the court allowed evidence to go to the jury upon a claim for extra service in revising the decisions of the register and receiver of the land office at Tallahassee upon pre-emption claims, which the defendant insisted he was directed to perform by a letter of G. Graham, Commissioner of the General Land Office, directed to the register and receiver at Tallahassee, dated July 27, 1827. It was shown by the testimony that this revision occupied from two to three months, and for this service the jury allowed the sum of $12,500. I excepted to the opinion of the court in the admission of this testimony, contending that the revision of these decisions was included in the ordinary and special duties of his office prescribed by law, and was not extra-official; also to the introduction of other letters specified in the copies of the bill of exceptions herewith inclosed. Upon the return of the verdict I entered a motion for a new trial, upon the ground that the verdict was against evidence, and was given under an obvious misconception of the charge of the court, and that the judge misdirected the jury; which motion was presented to the court and overruled."

By direction of Mr. Penrose, then Solicitor, the case was appealed, and in February, 1843, the judgment in the court below was reversed and a venire facias de novo awarded. After this there was much correspondence with the district attorney, and diligent efforts appear to have been made to prepare the case, and at November term, 1843, it again came on for trial, but in consequence of the inadmissibility of some of the papers offered in evidence the district attorney submitted to a nonsuit and commenced a new suit. The suit was finally tried at January term, 1847, under the same pleas and set-off as in the first case. The set-off plea was for services as counsel in arguing mandamus cases under instructions from the Land Office and extra compensation for adjudicating pre-emption claims. The jury found a verdict in favor of the defendant, and certified a balance due to him by the United States of $8,563.37. While the suit against General Call was in progress the suit against his sureties was continued to abide its result. Upon receiving the report of the last trial, Mr. Gillet, then Solicitor, directed the district attorney to forward to him "a transcript of the pleadings in the case and a copy of the instructions of the court to the jury," which was done, and on the 6th October, 1847, he instructed the district attorney (C. C. Yonge, esq.) as follows: "I have examined the papers relating to the trial of the suit brought by the United States against Richard K. Call, and find no possible question therein which can be carried to the Supreme Court; nor can I learn that there is any newly discovered material evidence which the United States can adduce if a new trial should be sought on that ground; hence I see no possible steps which can be taken in the cause by which a new trial can be obtained. It seems to be useless to continue the suit under these circumstances on the docket; hence you are authorized to cause it to be stricken from the docket at your earliest convenience." This was accordingly done, and thus the suit terminated.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

F. B. STREETER, Solicitor.

Hon. JAMES GUTHRIE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

P. S.—I return the letter of General Call.

From the foregoing it appears that after a full and fair trial there was a verdict rendered against the United States in favor of said Call for $8,563.37.

A "transcript of the pleadings in the case and a copy of the instructions of the court to the jury" were sent to the Solicitor of the Treasury for his revision and further direction.

Upon examination he says "he finds no possible question therein which can be carried to the Supreme Court."

Here we have the verdict of a jury finding in favor of said Call for $8,563.37. As between individuals this would be conclusive. Why not as between the United States and one of its citizens?

Your committee are aware that no valid judgment can be rendered against the United States upon a set-off as in this case, and that no execution can issue as against a private citizen. But can the Government afford to assume such a position as that?

It is true there is no evidence before the committee to sustain the items of the set-off. But is not the verdict of a jury upon these items, rendered upon testimony taken in open court, where the witnesses were subject to a strict cross-examination, of more avail and more satisfactory and convincing than ex parte affidavits?

Your committee think the verdict is persuasive, if not morally and equitably binding, and recommend the passage of the bill herewith reported.

The conclusion reached in this report commends itself to our judgment.

There can be nothing either in the fact that the evidence on which the verdict was based is not before us or that the claim is an old one.

For, first, the suit was instituted by the United States before a competent court, having full jurisdiction over the matter. After full investigation, on competent evidence, the verdict was rendered by a sworn jury and approved by a learned court. True, no judgment could be rendered on the verdict, but this does not impeach the finding as to the facts. It is only because no such judgment could be rendered that the petitioner is compelled to come to Congress for relief. The verdict is fully competent to establish the facts on which Congress shall act.

Second. That the claim is old does not detract from its validity, as it is certain that it never was paid. No interest is claimed. We recommend the passage of the bill herewith reported.

Mr. CONGER. I do not recollect the time when this claim first arose, but I think about fifty years, or something more than forty years at any rate. I venture to say that through the length of service of the oldest member of this body or of Congress it has been presented annually for consideration. For a long number of years it had adverse reports both in the Senate and in the House; but the years flew by, new men came in every decade to receive the testimony and consider this case, old things were forgotten, and at last, after about thirty-five or forty years, there came a committee reporting in favor of this bill or a similar one.

Since the first favorable report of a Senate committee it has not been contended in any report that there has been a new investigation, but that one first favorable report (and the only one I have ever known either in the other House or here) has been referred to last year and the year before, and from the time it was made until now it is the basis of a new report by the committee. The report of the first and only committee that reported favorably upon this claim has been adopted by subsequent committees and represented to the Senate. My recollection is now that the claim never did have a favorable report from any committee of the House. This claim has been rejected by committees for the last fifteen years almost continually. It seems to me very strange that for over forty years the case has been in Congress and there never has been found a Congress under any administration, in peace or in war, that has passed this bill and settled this half-century-old claim.

I am a little alarmed at the frequency with which old claims that come now from the heirs of the heirs of claimants are presented and urged before this body and in the other House of Congress. The age of a claim, the committee say, is nothing against it, but it does seem to me that a decent respect for the opinions of those men who have gone before us should make this body or any other body consider that the continuous and continued examination and rejection of it by committees here and by the Senate and by the committees of the House deserve a little consideration at our hands.

I have never in my examination of this claim seen even an equitable right in the claimants to recover against the United States, and I am making the remarks I do from my own examination of it on former occasions when it was before the committees of which I was a member. I do not believe this bill ought to pass. I do not think the mere verdict of a jury or the failure of either party to take the case to a higher court for consideration is sufficient to justify us in paying the claim. Nor ought the fact that it has slept so long, from 1843 till now, to have much weight in favor of its passage.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not know what has transpired in reference to this claim at the other end of the Capitol. I know that there have been two adverse reports against it at this end and three favorable reports. At the last Congress the Committee on Claims reported the bill unanimously as far as I know. I heard no objection to it, or at least if I did I have forgotten it, and I think the Senator from Michigan was a member of the committee at that time. But however that may be, the question is whether we owe the money or not, and that is to be decided upon the facts of the case, and not according to how many adverse reports or how many favorable reports have been made on the claim heretofore.

The facts of the case are few and simple. The United States brought a suit in a court having full jurisdiction over the matter against General Call. General Call made his defense to the suit by setting up a set-off, over which that court also had full and complete jurisdiction. There were two trials in this court, both of which resulted favorably to General Call, the jury on each trial finding a verdict in his favor. On the last trial the transcript of the case was submitted to the Attorney-General of the United States, with the evidence and with the charge given by the court, and he found that there was no error in the proceedings. If that is not sufficient to establish a just and valid claim against the United States, I should like to know what is.

Here is a trial before a competent court; here is the United States represented by a competent attorney; here is jurisdiction by the court over both parties and over the subject-matter; here is the finding of the jury, and here is the review of the facts of that case by the law officer of the United States, who decides that there is no error in it. If that is not sufficient to establish a claim, I confess that I do not know what is.

On the next point that it is an old claim, I do not know that there is any reason for refusing to pay my claim on the ground that it is old. If a claim be presented depending on oral testimony we might very well decline to entertain jurisdiction of it upon the ground that by lapse of time the evidence which might defeat the claim had been lost; but here there is no objection of that sort. It is a record and a record of a United States court, and a record, too, against which oral testimony can not be introduced. It is unimpeachable. That being so, it makes no difference that the claim is an old one unless we establish the precedent that the neglect of the Government for a long period of time to pay an honest and a just debt, though adjudicated by its own tribunals, is a sufficient reason for it to refuse again to pay it. There can be no answer to it. That is the exact position of this case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I have some knowledge of the general merits of this claim, and I think I can indorse everything which has been stated by the Senator from Mississippi. It is peculiar in some of its features. One of the most distinguished men that was ever identified with Florida, General Call, held a position under the Government; a friend of Jackson, his companion in all the great contests of that day, his confidential friend, and was afterwards appointed to an office under him, which he discharged in a way creditable to himself. After he retired from office he was sued by the Government—a great blunder, in my opinion, as the event proved. It was claimed that he was behind in the settlement of his accounts while disbursing public money in Florida. He had contended all along that instead of owing the Government, the Government owed him. I know very well the principle of law which precludes the possibility of suit being brought against the Government directly. General Call challenged the Government to a suit against him. It was instituted in its own court. That court, I may say, was presided over by one of the most impartial and, indeed, one of the ablest men that ever sat in any tribunal of any country. There was a great deal more involved in the matter than the mere money. The honor, the integrity of a man who had stood high in the confidence of one of the greatest men the country ever produced—all this was involved. He met the suit; he went before that court and a jury of the country impartially impaneled; the whole subject was investigated, not in the loose way, let me say to the Senate, that matters of that kind are usually investigated before committees of this body (and I speak with I think pardonable freedom on the subject), because they have not the time to give to these matters the care which should be given in a complete investigation—this matter was judicially ascertained. The court drew the attention of the jury to the precise issue. The Government charged this officer with defalcation. He set up his claim on his accounts. The matter was referred to the court by the Department for adjudication. If that jury had found a verdict against General Call, his estate according to law would have had to pay the penalty. Now it seems to me there ought to be some mutuality in trials of that description, so that where the Government charges a public officer with a defalcation and challenges him to a suit in one of its own courts, and when he goes before that court and satisfies its judge and the jury impaneled in accordance with law that instead of his being indebted to the Government the Government is indebted to him and a judgment is rendered for the amount—while I admit as a lawyer that you can not enforce that judgment by any ordinary process of execution, at the same time I do say that in morals there is an honorable obligation resting on the Government to pay it.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question in this connection?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Senator if after this proceeding in court the Government did not for several years prosecute the sureties upon the bond even after this finding?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Florida has expired.

Mr. CONGER. I hope he may be permitted by unanimous consent to answer my question.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. GEORGE. I want to answer the question propounded by the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired; he can not proceed unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed in order to give the Senator from Mississippi an opportunity to speak on that question.

Mr. GEORGE. I just wanted to answer the question propounded by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I shall be glad to have the Senator from Mississippi answer the question. He examined the case in committee.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Michigan says that, notwithstanding the verdict, the United States prosecuted the bond of General Call by proceeding against his sureties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi will please suspend. The eighth rule provides that while bills are under consideration under this rule five minutes' debate only shall be permitted, and no Senator shall speak more than once. A motion to indefinitely postpone does not in the opinion of the Chair take it out of the rule.

Mr. HARRIS. But "once on the same question;" such was certainly my impression.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Mississippi may be allowed to answer the question of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. GEORGE. That is all I want to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the Senator from Tennessee is technically right. The language of the rule is "on any question." The question being on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, the motion to indefinitely postpone is technically a different question. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Mississippi on that question. The Chair was in error before.

Mr. GEORGE. The letter of Mr. Streeter, the Solicitor of the Treasury, shows that on the rendering of this verdict the separate suit against the sureties was dismissed by the United States.

Mr. CONGER. I did not understand the report so.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. I withdraw the motion to indefinitely postpone.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, although upon the Committee on Claims, I desire to state that this report was presented by the subcommittee and concurred in by the committee during my absence. I am not satisfied, from what I can learn of the case from the report, to vote for the bill. It appears by this report that suit was instituted in February, 1840, against Richard K. Call to recover $5,907.53 alleged to be due from him as late receiver of public moneys at Tallahassee. The amount was afterward reduced to $5,060.13. General Call put in the pleas of nil debit, set-off, and payment. The suit went to trial, and General Call not only established the set-off to the amount of the claim of the United States, which was as I have said $5,060.13, but the jury found that the United States owed him for services the further sum of $7,923.72.

This has been called a judgment. This claim of $7,923.72 was not a judgment and could not have been made the basis of a judgment against the United States. The law authorized General Call to plead his set-off to the amount of the claim of the United States against him, but the jury in passing upon his claim found that the value of his services was $12,500.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I would ask him if his attention was ever called to the celebrated Reeside case from Pennsylvania, where this body held that a judgment of offset in this way did commit the Government to pay the amount the same as an ordinary judgment?

Mr. DOLPH. I can not hear the Senator.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I ask the Senator if his attention was ever called to the celebrated Reeside case that came up in the Senate—I have it not now at hand—many years ago, in which this body held that a judgment of this kind, on an offset against the Government like this, bound the Government to payment, and the Senate provided for the payment of the claim?

Mr. DOLPH. I have never had my attention called to that case; but no decision of any court could require Congress to make an appropriation for a claim. Congress should be satisfied that the claim is just. I say in this case that the basis of this claim is not a judgment against the United States, but the finding of a jury as to the value of services performed by this officer. The jury in the first trial found that these services were of the value of $12,500, which canceled the claim of the United States against this officer of $5,060.13, and left a balance of $7,923.72.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Oregon has expired.

Mr. DOLPH. I have been interrupted, but I will conclude in a moment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that unanimous consent be given that the Senator may conclude his remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not allow the Senator to proceed except by unanimous consent.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope unanimous consent will be given.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked that the Senator from Oregon may proceed. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Following the example on the other side, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the Senator can not proceed.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection is withdrawn. Is there again objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Oregon will proceed.

Mr. DOLPH. Upon the second trial this finding of the jury was increased so as to show a balance due from the United States to General Call of $8,563.37. What that is based upon appears in this report, and I desire to read it. In the communication embodied in the report from Mr. Streeter to the honorable Secretary of the Treasury it is stated:

It was shown by the testimony that this revision occupied from two to three months, and for this service the jury allowed the sum of $12,500.

I think it sufficient that the large claim of the Government against General Call was canceled by services which occupied his attention only two or three months, without now making an appropriation for his benefit of the further sum of $8,563.37. I am not satisfied by the report of the merits of the claim.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Claims it was my duty to consider this claim. Those of the committee who were present when it was considered, which number did not include my friend who has just taken his seat, though that this claim was a just one and ought to be allowed, and there was no division of opinion. It was the opinion of the competent tribunal trying the case that this balance was due as stated in the report. Whether or not it was in the nature of a judgment was of less consideration, because the simple question was whether this amount was due. It was found to be due by a jury upon evidence properly introduced before a competent tribunal. For one I wish in the cases before us here we had anything like as good testimony as appears in this case to justify our action in reporting claims. There was no division of sentiment in committee, as I have said. It was stated that this case was considered at the last Congress by the Committee on Claims of the Senate, and that there was no division of sentiment then. I certainly hope the bill will pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill, there were on a division—ayes 18, noes 7; no quorum voting.

Mr. ALLISON. The call of the yeas and nays will disclose a quorum.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SEWELL (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND].

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I desire to say that I am paired generally with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. I do not know how he would vote on this question, and therefore I do not vote.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 33, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Beck,	Farley,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Blair,	George,	McPherson,	Riddleberger,
Bowen,	Gorman,	Manderson,	Slater,
Brown,	Groome,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Butler,	Hampton,	Miller of Cal.,	Vest,
Call,	Harris,	Palmer,	Walker.
Coke,	Jackson,	Pike,
Cullom,	Jones of Florida,	Plumb,

NAYS—10.

Allison,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Sawyer.
Conger,	Ingalls,	Platt,
Dolph,	McMillan,	Sabin,

ABSENT—33.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Sewell,
Anthony,	Frye,	Lapham,	Sherman,
Bayard,	Garland,	Logan,	Vance,

Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Mitchell,	Wilson.
Cockrell,	Hill,	Morgan,
Colquitt,	Hoar,	Pendleton,
Dawes,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,

So the bill was passed.

JOSEPH R. SHANNON.

The bill (S. 88) to provide for the payment of the claim of Joseph R. Shannon was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a report.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can not consider this bill properly within the morning hour under the five-minute rule. There is quite a lengthy report in this case, and there has been an adverse report made upon the same bill at this session of Congress in the opposite end of the Capitol, and that report is also a voluminous report, and as a matter of course it will have to be read to the Senate. Under the circumstances I think it is better for the bill to go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Being objected to, the bill goes over.

FRANCIS B. VAN HOESEN.

The bill (S. 539) for the relief of Francis B. Van Hoesen was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It empowers the Commissioner of the General Land Office, on behalf of the United States, to accept a relinquishment by the governor of Minnesota, executed under the authority of an act of the Legislature of that State approved February 24, 1881, of the title derived by that State through an internal-improvement selection certified by the Commissioner of the General Land Office on May 8, 1869, for the southeast quarter of section 3, township 128, range 40 west, in the district of lands, subject to sale at Alexandria, Minn. The location of the tract by Francis B. Van Hoesen, with military bounty-land warrant No. 106976, for one hundred and sixty acres, issued under act of March 3, 1855, and which was patented by the United States to Francis B. Van Hoesen on the 15th of October, 1870, is confirmed, and the State of Minnesota is to be allowed to select other lands in lieu of the southeast quarter relinquished by this act.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to add to the bill "within said State, from the lands subject to private entry."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A. A. THOMAS.

The bill (S. 643) for the relief of A. A. Thomas was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to A. A. Thomas, or his assigns, $540, as a reimbursement for money paid by Thomas for the use of the United States while register of the United States land office at Cawker City, Kans.; and the further sum of $67.14, balance due to Thomas as compensation as register for the quarters ending September 30, 1872, and March 31, 1875, respectively.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN C. HARGRAVE.

The bill (S. 361) granting a pension to John C. Hargrave was announced as next in order upon the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is objected to, and goes over.

CONVENTION WITH HAWAII.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (S. R. 27) as to giving notice to terminate the convention of June 3, 1875, with His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an adverse report in this case.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I desire to submit a motion to indefinitely postpone the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's motion is in order. Does the Senator make that motion?

Mr. MILLER, of California. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California that the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. CONGER. Let the joint resolution be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A joint resolution as to giving notice to terminate the convention of June 3, 1875, with His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands"——

Mr. SEWELL. I think the Senate should suspend action on this matter until the presence of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] who introduced the joint resolution.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I am perfectly willing that it shall go over.

Mr. CONGER. I asked for the reading of the joint resolution. It has not yet been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas the said convention, in its fifth article, provides that the convention shall remain in force for seven years from the date at which it may come into operation, and further until the expiration of twelve months after either of the high contracting parties shall give notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same, each of the high contracting parties being at liberty to give such notice to the other at the end of the said term of seven years, or at any time thereafter: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the President of the United States be requested to give the notice to terminate said convention in the manner and at the time set forth and provided for in said fifth article.

Mr. SHERMAN. This measure ought not to be brought up in the morning hour. It involves questions of grave importance, and I desire when it does come up (as I was not able to concur with the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations) to address the Senate upon it. I hope it will not be brought up except when I am present.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I will ask that it be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An objection carries it over, if objection is made.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am in favor of the passage of the bill, but as a matter of course it could not be passed under the five-minute rule as to debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection would transfer it to the Calendar under Rule IX instead of Rule VIII. Does the Senator from Ohio object?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that, so that a majority of the Senate can take it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California to indefinitely postpone the joint resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to its being indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio object to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the joint resolution goes over.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I withdraw the motion to postpone indefinitely and will let the resolution go over under Rule IX.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It goes over under objection with or without the motion of the Senator from California.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather that it should go over.

CORPS OF JUDGE-ADVOCATES.

Mr. MAXEY. As we can not dispose of the next bill on the Calendar before 2 o'clock, I ask for unanimous consent to do a little morning business.

The bill (S. 1541) to provide promotion in the corps of judge-advocates was reported favorably from the Committee on Military Affairs. There are some slight verbal changes which we desire to make in the bill. They are not material, but would make it, as we think, a better bill. I move that it be recommitted to that committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent to consider at this time a motion to recommit the bill indicated by him. Is there objection? The Chair hear none. Is there objection to recommitting the bill? The Chair hears none, and the order will be made to recommit it.

C. M. WILCOX.

Mr. MAXEY. Yesterday the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. LOGAN] reported adversely the bill (S. 139) for the relief of C. M. Wilcox, and it was indefinitely postponed. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar, with a view of asking leave to submit a minority report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent of the Senate to move at this time to reconsider the vote by which the bill indicated by him was indefinitely postponed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. Is there objection to the reconsideration? The Chair hears none, and the order will be made, and the bill placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask that the minority may be permitted to file their views and have them presented to be considered with the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that no order of the Senate is necessary for that purpose, as the minority can file their views.

Mr. MAXEY. Then I give notice that the minority will file their views, to be considered with that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that it is the custom of the Senate for the minority to ask permission of the Senate to submit their views.

Mr. MAXEY. So I understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Therefore the Chair will inquire, is there objection to the minority of the committee submitting their views in the form of a report in respect to the bill referred to by the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears no objection, and the order will be made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 51) authorizing an expenditure of money for Indian educational purposes.

SPECIAL MESSENGER FOR COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred a resolution for the employment of a special messenger for the Committee on Claims, have instructed me to report it without amendment and recommend its passage. The chairman of the Committee on Claims informs me that there is immediate necessity for the passage of the resolution because the regular messenger of that committee is absent on official duties. I therefore ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ and to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate at the usual rate of compensation a special messenger for the Committee on Claims during the absence upon official business of the regular messenger of that committee.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The Senate, as in Committeee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] as modified by himself.

Mr. PUGH. Before the debate on the Plumb amendment is renewed, I desire to offer an amendment to it, if it be now in order to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the form of the Senator's amendment? Is it an amendment to the text of the bill or an amendment simply to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. PUGH. It is an amendment to the Plumb amendment which is proposed as a second section to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such an amendment is now in order.

Mr. COKE. Did not the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] offer an amendment to that yesterday.

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. PUGH. I move to insert after the word "bank," in the second line, the words "or the legal-tender greenbacks held by any national bank;" so as to read:

That whenever the circulation of any national bank, or the legal-tender greenbacks held by any national bank, or any portion thereof, shall be surrendered, and the same is not taken up by other national banks within thirty days thereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon issue an equivalent amount of Treasury notes, &c.

That meets the criticism of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] as to the limitation to issue these Treasury notes upon the surrender of the circulation of the national banks. It will include greenbacks as well as the circulation of the national banks. It may be that under the existing law, if greenbacks are surrrendered when the bonds are called, they may be reissued, which would make my amendment unnecessary; but if that be not the effect of the existing law my amendment can do no harm. It makes it certain that upon the return of the national-bank circulation or greenbacks, when bonds are called, there shall be an issue of these Treasury notes.

Then, in the second place, I propose to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "Government," in the second sentence——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Alabama that one amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is all that will be in order at this time. Of course the Senator can give notice of any further amendment that he may propose to offer.

Mr. PUGH. My modifications are all germane; they are intended to have the same general effect. They are to be inserted in three different places, but the general effect will be the same. I have to divide them in order to give notice of the place in the amendment where I propose to insert the words that I desire to go in. I will read the whole amendment I propose, so that the Senate may understand that if a vote has to be taken upon the amendments separately the vote will be taken with reference to the right that I claim to offer the others in their order.

I propose also to amend by inserting after the word "Government," in the second sentence, the words "except its interest-bearing bonds;" so as to read:

Said Treasury notes shall be deposited in the Treasury and paid out as other moneys kept for the discharge of the obligations of the Government, except its interest-bearing bonds.

Mr. PLUMB. To simplify the matter I will accept that amendment.

Mr. PUGH. Then, third, I propose to amend by adding at the end of the section the following:

The true intent and meaning of this section being that the volume of paper money outstanding, exclusive of gold and silver certificates, shall not be diminished by the payment of the interest-bearing bonds of the United States.

These three amendments I understand to be in perfect harmony with the intention of the Senator from Kansas in offering his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas modify his amendment according to the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. PLUMB. I did not hear the first amendment proposed by him.

Mr. PUGH. I will read it again.

Mr. PLUMB. Just one moment, if you please. The second amendment, I will state to the Senator, is in precisely the language of an amendment I drew. Submitting it to a gentleman on the floor for his criticism, he suggested that it should take another form, which form on his suggestion I gave it, and in that shape amended my own amendment, which I afterward withdrew. I am perfectly willing to accept the second amendment.

Mr. PUGH. That is the third amendment. The second amendment that I propose relates to the exception of interest-bearing bonds.

Mr. PLUMB. I mean the last one.

Mr. PUGH. The third is to add at the end of the section:

The true intent and meaning of this section being that the volume of paper money outstanding, exclusive of gold and silver certificates, shall not be diminished by the payment of the interest-bearing bonds of the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. That is the one I was just referring to. I am willing to accept that amendment, but the first amendment I did not hear read.

Mr. PUGH. Now I will read the first. I propose to amend by inserting after the word "bank," in the second line, the words "or the legal-tender greenbacks held by any national bank." The Senator from Delaware yesterday construed the amendment of the Senator from Kansas as limiting the right to issue Treasury notes upon a surrender of the notes of the national banks, and he called attention to the amendment of the law made at the last session authorizing the national banks, instead of returning their own circulation, to pay in greenbacks and take up their bonds. My amendment is intended to meet that criticism of the meaning of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. I suppose that under the existing law if the greenbacks are paid in or surrendered for any purpose they have to be reissued; but in order to exclude any construction that might not operate to compel the Treasury to reissue the greenbacks I propose to insert in addition to the national banking circulation the greenbacks that may be surrendered by the national banks when the bonds are called.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. PLUMB. I did not wish to take the time of the Senator from Alabama. I thought he was through.

Mr. PUGH. I think the effect of the amendments I wish to offer is fully understood by the Senate, and I do not propose to take up any further time in the discussion of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the first amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PUGH. Do I understand the Senator from Kansas as accepting that amendment?

Mr. PLUMB. No; I want to make a proposition connected with the first amendment which I think will be satisfactory to the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment of the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Kansas can see how far he accepts it.

The SECRETARY. In line 2, after the word "bank," it is proposed to insert "or the legal-tender greenbacks held by any national bank;" so as to read:

That whenever the circulation of any national bank, or the legal-tender greenbacks held by any national bank, or any portion thereof, shall be surrendered, and the same is not taken up by other national banks within thirty days thereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon reissue an equivalent amount of Treasury notes of the denominations now provided by law for national-bank notes.

Mr. PLUMB. I accept the other two amendments. The Secretary may report them, however.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas accepts the two amendments already read.

Mr. PLUMB. No; I accept the second and third.

Mr. PUGH. The second and third are accepted by the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The two amendments accepted by the Senator from Kansas will be reported.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Government," in line 9, it is proposed to insert "except its interest-bearing bonds;" so as to read:

Said Treasury notes shall be deposited in the Treasury and paid out as other moneys kept for the discharge of the obligations of the Government, except its interest-bearing bonds.

At the end of the section it is proposed to add:

The true intent and meaning of this section being that the volume of paper money outstanding, exclusive of gold and silver certificates, shall not be diminished by the payment of the interest-bearing bonds of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas accepts the latter two amendments and modifies his former amendment accordingly.

Mr. PLUMB. I will accept the last amendment, but I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that the second amendment be so amended as that it shall be for interest on the public debt or the redemption of the bonds of the Government, so that we shall not assume to interfere, as I have no intention of doing, with any specific contract which the Government may have outstanding with reference to the manner in which it shall pay the public debt. I suggest the phrase "including the interest on the public debt and the payment of the same," because if the interest is payable in coin the debt is also payable in coin, and the limitation ought to be upon both payments.

Mr. PUGH. What change does the Senator propose?

Mr. PLUMB. I propose simply the discharge of the obligations of the Government "except interest on the public debt and the payment of the same."

Mr. PUGH. The payment of the interest?

Mr. PLUMB. And the payment of the debt.

Mr. PUGH. I have no objection to that amendment. That simply includes the payment of the interest.

Mr. PLUMB. The payment of the interest and the principal of the public debt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the modification of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Government," in line 9, it is proposed to insert "except the interest or principal of the public debt."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified. The question is upon the first amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. PLUMB. I think myself the language of my amendment as it now stands is sufficient, but still I have no objection to amplifying it in order to perfectly meet the case.

Mr. PUGH. I stated that I thought under the existing law the Treasury would be compelled to reissue the greenbacks that are returned, but in order to make it certain I did not think there would be any harm in this amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. The word "surrendered" as used in the second line of my amendment refers to the control of the banks over their own circulation. Whenever they give up that control it is surrendered to the Government of the United States. Thereafter all questions connected with the redemption of that currency are under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury or the Comptroller of the Currency. I think the word "surrendered" meets the case, but if it is designed to add anything to that, I think what is added should be after the word "surrendered," and should be in a little different phraseology from that employed by the Senator from Alabama. It should refer, I think, to the circulation itself and not to the legal-tender notes to be deposited, because there would be danger perhaps of qualifying existing law in regard to what should be done with legal-tender notes when they had once been paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. PUGH. My purpose was to avoid any contraction in the volume of the circulation by the return of the greenbacks instead of the notes of the national banks.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator will permit me, I suggest that he simply so modify his amendment as to add after the word "surrendered," in line 2, the words "or legal-tender notes of the United States shall have been deposited for the redemption thereof."

Mr. PUGH. That would be the same. That would have the same effect.

Mr. PLUMB. I think it would express the idea a little more perfectly than the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PUGH. That is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas accept the amendment of the Senator from Alabama as a further modification of his own amendment?

Mr. PLUMB. I accept it with the amendment. I propose to add after the word "surrendered" the words "or legal-tender notes of the United States shall have been deposited for the redemption thereof."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama assents to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. PUGH. That is the same in legal effect, as I understand it.

Mr. MORGAN. Now let us have it reported. I should be glad to hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report that part of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas as modified.

The SECRETARY. After the word "surrendered," in line 2, it is proposed to insert the words "or legal-tender notes of the United States shall have been deposited for the redemption thereof;" so as to read:

That whenever the circulation of any national bank, or the legal-tender greenbacks held by any national bank, or any portion thereof, shall be surrendered, or legal-tender notes of the United States shall have been deposited for the redemption thereof, and the same is not taken up by other national banks within thirty days thereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon issue an equivalent amount of Treasury notes of the denominations now provided by law for national-bank notes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas as modified by him.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that, as I understand the law, the amendment which he suggests to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama would not accomplish his purpose. The banks may also deposit any other lawful money for the redemption of their circulation. It is not necessary that a bank should deposit its greenbacks in order to redeem its outstanding circulation.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not think that any case has ever occurred where they have deposited coin, because they would then be required to pay the express charges on the coin. Still, in order to meet the criticism, it will be easy to add "or coin;" so as to read: "legal-tender notes or coin."

Mr. MCPHERSON. Do I understand the Senator from Kansas to mean——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey will suspend a moment. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that several days since the yeas and nays were ordered upon the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. If that be true, as it must be—the record so shows—then the Senator from Kansas had no power under the rule, except by unanimous consent, to modify his own amendment. However, the Chair will put the question now. Is there objection to the modifications that the Senator from Kansas has from time to time made since the yeas and nays were ordered? Is there objection to those modifications? The Chair hears none, and the amendment will stand as modified.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey was entitled to the floor when the Chair interrupted him.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Do I understand from the amendment last offered by the Senator from Kansas that it is his purpose and intention to limit the circulation to exactly the amount it now is? The amendment covers both the surrender of the national-bank notes and the Treasury notes deposited with the Treasury for the redemption of the bank notes. That I understand is the meaning of his amendment. Do I further understand that after the bonds are surrendered to the banks or to the corporations or individuals owning them, on an application for a new issue of notes that application must necessarily be denied by reason of this provision?

Mr. PLUMB. This is not intended to interfere in the slightest degree with the operation of taking out currency under the national banking system. It is designed simply to prevent the contraction which would follow from the surrender of that circulation.

Mr. MCPHERSON. So if not taken out within thirty days, as provided in the amendment, then it would become the duty of the Government to issue Treasury notes in lieu of the circulation thus surrendered?

Mr. PLUMB. If during the period of thirty days a national bank surrenders circulation, which is not taken up by any other national bank, then the Secretary of the Treasury fills the void thus created by the issue of Treasury notes.

Mr. MCPHERSON. We will suppose after the expiration of thirty days new banks will need to be organized for the purpose of giving a sufficient amount of circulation to meet the increasing demands of the country, say in the West; then it would be perfectly proper to apply for circulation under a deposit of bonds as before, and as long as that was kept in excess of the amount of currency now in circulation there would be no further necessity for the issue of Treasury notes.

Mr. PLUMB. None whatever.

Mr. MCPHERSON. That is as I understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. PLUMB. There is only one branch of this subject to which I desire to refer, and I do not know that I really ought to detain the Senate for that purpose; but the declaration made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] was of such an extraordinary character, coming from such a source, that I feel that it is entitled to some attention.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] offered an amendment on the 14th of the present month to this effect:

That when any bonds of the United States deposited in the Treasury by a banking association to secure its circulation are called and paid by the Government, such banking association shall have the right to substitute in the place thereof bonds issued by any of the States; and the bonds so deposited, as to their assignment, management, control, sale, or disposal, shall in all respects be subject to the laws which govern the said banking associations and the officers and agents of the United States with respect to the bonds for which said State bonds are substituted, so far as the same are applicable. But said bonds of the States shall not be received as a substitute for bonds of the United States so called and paid at a rate exceeding — per cent. of their value on the face thereof; nor shall the bonds of any State be received on deposit unless the interest theretofore accrued on the same for the period of five years previous to such deposit shall have been duly paid; nor shall any such bonds be so received on deposit when the same are worth less than par in the city of New York.

The Senator from Iowa in the remarks which he made against the amendment pending used these words:

Now, of the two propositions not yet noticed by me, the one presented by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and the one presented by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], I should greatly prefer the measure suggested by the Senator from Alabama. His proposition looks to the preservation and expansion and extension of the national banking system, keeping in mind constantly the absolute security of the noteholder; but the proposition of the Senator from Kansas and the correlative proposition of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] look to the absolute destruction of the national banking system, and if the principle of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas shall prevail, the national banking system is doomed, and I think, for one, that it is too valuable to be disturbed either now or in the future.

Mr. President, the adoption of my amendment does not affect the national banking system one way or the other. It proceeds upon the theory advanced by the friends of the system that it is in danger of large diminution as now constituted and is doomed unless legislation is had to prevent it. It has been conceded in all this debate that the system is doomed unless we adopt some measures now affirmatively for its preservation. The Senator from Iowa is so concerned about the national banking system and is so afraid of the issue of Treasury notes possessing the function of national-bank notes that he prefers to have what he terms a "national banking system" based not upon national bonds but upon State bonds.

It seems to me that it is rather a misuse of terms to call a system of that kind a national banking system, because back of it is not any longer national responsibility for redemption, not national sovereignty, but State responsibility and State sovereignty, and that alone. If the Senator had been speaking for himself alone I might have been moved to speak of the proposition with some lack of respect, but he speaks with authority for a million and a half of people who for the last twenty years have honored him and whom he has in turn conspicuously honored.

I am bound to presume that what he expresses is the sentiment of the people of Iowa. It is entitled to respect as their sentiment, as it would not be if it were the sentiment of an individual. I have great respect for that Commonwealth, one of the most prosperous and one of the most intelligent of all the States of the Union. I am confronting now a statement in their behalf, which I believe to be authoritative, that they prefer a currency based upon State bonds issued upon State responsibility, dependent upon State solvency and State willingness to pay, rather than a currency based upon the responsibility, the solvency, and the willingness to pay of the National Government, and redeemable always in coin of the Government at its Treasury. I wish to join issue with that opinion with all due respect.

We have been warned in this debate of the danger of partisan legislation upon the currency question; but the very legislation that should require the deposit of State bonds as a security for currency can fix county bonds, township bonds, school bonds, city bonds, water-works bonds, or whatever else may be in the imagination of anybody as security for currency notes, and it comes back to the one single thing after all, the exercise of the legislative power upon this question. It is assumed that by putting a State bond between us and the emission of the bank bill, or a county bond, or a township bond, thereby to some extent we are relieved from the possibility of improvident and extravagant legislation. The Senator from Iowa did not say whether he would prefer Mississippi or Minnesota bonds. I suppose any of them would answer his purpose, because when in his representative capacity he had got to the point of regarding a Treasury note receivable for Government dues and redeemable in coin at the Treasury as so absolutely vicious he would not stop to consider any particular degrees of value as pertaining to his new national-bank note, any form of insolvency being preferable to solvency which depends upon national credit.

The Senator from Iowa had the honor also to say:

> And when such men as Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Jefferson and General Washington busied their minds with considering what were the best and wisest methods of disposing of those debts—

That is, the debts of the several States after the Revolutionary war—

> it never entered their fertile brain to adopt the suggestions of the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Missouri.

But I could not help being amused at the hop, skip, and jump with which the Senator passed over a very critical period in the history of the United States, when the statesmen, of whom he was one, did not stop to consider what the fertile mind of Mr. Hamilton or Mr. Jefferson or General Washington thought about the emergency in which the country was then placed. He spoke with his rare felicity of the doubt that was expressed in regard to the wisdom of the exercise of the power of issuing Treasury notes, and especially making them a legal tender, and then he closed by saying in substance that those later statesmen met all these questions of the improper exercise of the legislative power in this direction by resolving that they would go only so far, a sort of ad captandum idea that as Congress once exercised the power of only going so far they could never exercise it again. As much as to say we can not to-day resolve not to issue more than $700,000,000 or any other sum deemed proper, and stick to it with consistency and due regard for the interests of the country, as we did during the period of the war.

Mr. President, this is not a question of kind; it is a question of degree. Whatever Jefferson did do or might have done, whatever were his views about the powers of legislation under the Constitution, the answer has been given by the legislation of 1862 and following years, and by the decision of the Supreme Court upon it as to its validity and effect, and the ample and emphatic recognition of that at a much later period by which Congress sought to maintain, as it is now maintaining as a permanent part of the currency of this country, $356,000,000 of the legal-tender notes issued during the war.

I do not believe that all the wisdom of this country died with the return of peace in 1865. I believe that it may still be wise to issue Treasury notes based upon the credit and resources of the Government and backed by the deposit of specie or other governmental assurance of their payment when necessary to replace the national-bank notes which are retired and which we can not induce the banks to reissue, and especially rather to do this than to plunge into the slough of State-bank currency, from which we were relieved by the greenback and national-bank note in 1862 and in 1864.

I do not want any currency based upon State bonds, nor upon county bonds, nor township bonds, nor city bonds, nor anything of that kind. I would as soon go back to the old State banking system and be done with it.

I think also the Senator from Iowa might have illustrated the candor which usually characterizes him better than he did when he resorted to the pretext in opposition to this amendment that the Senator from Missouri and I were seeking to accumulate still more money in the Treasury than now existed there, unmindful of the fact that I am the only person, as I believe, in this body who during the past six years has proposed to cut down, to reduce the amount of money held there for the redemption of the legal-tender notes. And yet for the want of a better argument the Senator from Iowa put upon the Senator from Missouri and myself the intention to still further accumulate what he said were the surplus funds of the Treasury by reason of the proposed adoption of the amendment before the Senate.

I agree with him that there is too much money there; that is to say, there is more money there than is necessary to meet any possible demand for the redemption of the legal-tender notes. I have sought on two separate occasions to limit that amount and been voted down by the Senate.

But he was misleading again when he called attention to the fact that there were four hundred and eighty-odd millions of money in the Treasury, because more than $200,000,000 of that is not the money of the United States, but is the money of individuals who have deposited it there, and it is held there not as the money of the Government, but as a trust for the redemption of the gold and silver certificates which the Government itself issued upon the basis of that deposit, so that the amount of money which belongs to the Government which is in the Treasury for all purposes, the payment of interest on the public debt, the payment of current obligations, the redemption as fast as presented of the legal-tender notes, is only about $150,000,000. It is too much, I agree, but it is not the sum stated by the Senator from Iowa.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] got his metaphors mixed a little, I think. He and the Senator from Iowa agree that one of the great and injurious effects of this amendment if adopted will be that if the banks should surrender $300,000,000 of currency and under the operation of my amendment $300,000,000 of Treasury notes should take their place, and then the banks should turn round, deposit their bonds over again, and call for the issue of $300,000,000 of national-bank circulation, thereby we should have swollen the currency $300,000,000 beyond what it now is and far beyond need. It does not take much of a tale to put that down. If $300,000,000 of national-bank notes are to be retired, is it not the dictate of ordinary prudence to provide something to take their place? The mere suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky that the banks may reduce the currency by $300,000,000 calls for something to limit the bad effect of that.

Then there is held up on the other side, in terrorem over us, the pretense that these banks having withdrawn $300,000,000 and it having been followed by the issue of $300,000,000 of Treasury notes, whereby the volume of the currency has been kept intact, will turn around and take out $300,000,000 over again. Why? Could there be anything to more fully illustrate the fallacy of the Senator from Kentucky in his new-found zeal for this system which for so long he has consistently and vindictively attacked? Is it to be supposed that these banks will turn around and take $300,000,000 of currency just for the fun of the thing? Is that a business he thinks worthy to be kept up—a system based on mere caprice? But, Mr. President, the answer to all that is that the banks can to-day take out not only $1,000,000, or $10,000,000, but $100,000,000, $500,000,000, or $1,000,000,000. Does anybody believe they will? If we do believe they will, if the Finance Committee so believe, and if the Senator from Kentucky so believes, why this proposition to enact into a law the bill of the Senator from New Jersey or the amendment of the Senator from Vermont? If the banks are ready and willing, as they now intimate, to take out large sums of currency to add to those already outstanding, what the need of legislation? It is because there is no such assurance, it is because the system is failing and has failed to produce the former results of a currency whose volume should always be adequate to the wants of the people, and that instead of such a volume the volume is being unduly contracted, that this bill is before us.

What is the remedy? The remedy is to add absolutely, against the judgment of the banks as expressed by their non-action and affirmatively by one of their number, $35,000,000 at one turn of the wheel to the currency outstanding. And then what? That is because we are afraid the country can not stand the diminution in amount now impending, and yet we add just that much to the power of contraction which the banks now have. If it will hurt a man to fall down a bank twenty-five feet high, will it not hurt him worse to fall down one thirty-five feet high? You add 10 per cent. to the volume of the currency outstanding. It stimulates business artificially and viciously, and having stimulated it artificially and viciously, you are leaving the seeds of disease and of destruction in the system which will just as inevitably as now lead to contraction, only that it will be worse, because it will be contraction from a higher standpoint than it will be if the law remains as it now is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I have an amendment to that amendment that I send up to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama proposes an amendment to the amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 2, after the word "surrendered," it is proposed to insert:

> In consequence of the call and payment of any bonds of the United States pledged to secure such circulation.

So that the clause will read:

> That whenever the circulation of any national bank, or the legal-tender greenbacks held by any national bank, or any portion thereof, shall be surrendered in consequence of the call and payment of any bonds of the United States pledged to secure such circulation or legal-tender notes of the United States which have been deposited for the redemption thereof, and the same is not taken up by other national banks within thirty days thereafter, &c.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the object of my amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is to require Treasury notes to be issued whenever bonds which have been deposited for the redemption of the circulation of the national banks have been called in by the Government and paid. The amendment as modified by the new Committee on Finance, my colleague and the Senator from Kansas, this morning, seems to fix a rigid law in respect of the amount of the currency that shall remain out. Under existing laws that amount of currency is to some extent elastic. It accommodates itself to the fluctuating demands of trade and commerce. Under what is called the banking act, at the last session of Congress, we limited this fluctuation so that it should not exceed $3,000,000 per month, so that the banks should not have the power of contracting the currency at will for speculative purposes, or, on the other hand, of expanding it at will for like purposes. It was supposed then that that was as great a restriction as Congress could wisely put upon the volume of currency. Now the Senator from Kansas comes forward with a rigid restriction, as I understand it, that the volume of currency in this country shall remain not less than the amount of national-bank notes that are now out, the amount of greenbacks that are now out, the amount of gold and silver certificates that we have issued, and the amount of gold and silver in circulation at large in the country. I would not like to prescribe to any commercial country, to any growing country, either a maximum or a minimum of lawful currency. I would rather leave that to be regulated by the demands of trade, and to allow those men who are engaged in all the wide industries which now so beautify and enrich this country to have an opportunity to have as much money as they needed, and not an unnecessary quantity, for an excess or a redundancy of money in a country is sometimes quite as dangerous in inducing speculation as too small an amount is calamitous in causing the depression of prices and values of property.

I think that the regulations, as they are now provided by law, in restraint of the national banking system are quite sufficient to prevent those banks, with all their powers, from enlarging the currency unduly or from restricting it whenever they may see proper to do so.

This feature of our financial system has grown up, like many others, through experience and observation and through a wise purpose on the part of the Congress of the United States to give to our people the very best financial system that we possibly can. I think, sir, that this country is to be greatly congratulated that our present financial system has not been the outgrowth of the thoughts of any one man; it has not been the pet of any one party; but it has grown up under the experience of the country, like the constitution of England grew up, in adaptation to the idiosyncrasies of our people, to our trade and commerce, to our necessities as they have been developed from time to time. This last feature of giving an elastic limit to currency was found to be necessary, and was incorporated into our system after due debate and mature consideration, and so far I have heard no objection to it either in respect of its placing too great a cramp upon the currency of the country or of its inducing too large an expansion of it. I am therefore content to abide by the system as modified in the last bank act, rather than to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Kansas and my colleague as they have agreed upon it and as I understand it.

I do not think we should undertake to prescribe to the people of the United States that they shall only have so much money in circulation, and no more and no less. When we do that we put the Chinese iron boot upon the growth of our country, and we are likely to produce disfiguration and lameness perhaps for years to come. I prefer to leave that matter as it is.

I confess, sir, that I do not comprehend the amendment of the Senator from Kansas as modified by the agreement between my colleague and himself, and either I am badly in the woods about it or he is. I take it for granted that it is the Senator from Kansas and not myself that is in the bushes, for the reason that he has changed his position suddenly, without notice, and in front of the enemy since yesterday morning. After one night of rumination on this subject, and after the delivery of speeches by my colleague and the Senator from Kansas, they have concluded that the Senator from Kansas had not projected a scheme of perfect wisdom when he laid his first amendment before the Senate, and now we find them ingrafting into this amendment of some most radical and material changes in the financial system of this country.

I think that in our very artificial system of financiering, into which we were forced by the exigencies of a great and terrible war, we are continually deceiving ourselves with appearances, and forgetting the cold and solid facts which lie at it base. When we come to analyze and to understand it really and truly, no part of the paper currency of the United States depends for its support upon anything else than the good faith of the American Government, and that depends upon the good faith of the people in paying their contribution of taxes into the Treasury.

Now to illustrate this point I take the greenback first. There are $346,000,000 I believe of greenback legal-tenders. They are limited so that they shall be neither more nor shall they be less. They are curbed with restrictions so that they shall not be redeemed. All we can do with a legal-tender greenback now is, when it is worn out, to put a fresh piece of paper of the same similitude into circulation with the same obligations in all respects.

Now, sir, upon what is that promise to pay based? It is based only upon the good faith of the people of the United States as expressed in our Congressional action and their corresponding good faith in the maintenance of the credit of the Government by the payment of their taxation. That is all of it. We have, it is true, an amount of money in the Treasury of the United States held in reserve for the purpose of being resorted to to redeem these greenbacks. That money is not pledged in trust for their redemption; it is not a fund set apart like a coin fund upon which an ordinary bank would predicate its circulation, set apart and held in trust for its redemption. No holder of a greenback note has any legal or equitable trust fastened upon the money in the Treasury of the United States for its payment. It is a mere reserve, which we say shall be, I believe, $100,000,000, although at present I believe it is $150,000,000, and that it shall not be below a certain sum of money which I remember is $100,000,000.

Where is the obligation of redemption and where is the power of redemption and the duty of redemption, and to what must the holder of the greenback look for the redemption of that promise to pay? Simply and only to the good faith of the United States Government. We need not deceive ourselves about that proposition; it is too plain for denial.

Now I take the gold and silver certificates. These are Treasury notes sold to the people in consideration of the deposit of gold or silver coin or silver bullion to an amount equal to the paper which is issued in lieu thereof, and it is to be paid in kind, as expressed on the face of the paper, by the Treasury of the United States whenever it may be presented in sums of $10 as to silver or $20 as to gold. What is that? Is that banking paper? In one sense you may say that it is, but in the true and literal sense of it it is a Treasury note, sold out of the Treasury of the United States for a consideration paid into that Treasury in gold or silver, as the case may be.

I take occasion here to remark in behalf of that class of currency, for which I have great respect, that the honorable ex-Secretary of the Treasury, now a member of this body [Mr. SHERMAN], in debate here has frequently stated that while the law permitted him to do it he purchased $96,000,000 of gold coin into the Treasury of the United States with silver certificates. That is one little point in history that I can never pass by without paying to it my obeisance and without signifying my delight that such demonstration has been made in disproof of all the theories which that able financier has suggested to the contrary as to the value of our silver coinage laws.

That is the second class of paper money that we have out, gold and silver certificates redeemable in gold and silver. We are not bound to hold that money for which these certificates sold in the Treasury in trust for the specific purpose of redeeming these issues. We may spend it as we choose to spend it, without impeaching any of our obligations, moral, legal, or equitable. We have merely sold the certificates, and have got the proceeds in gold and silver in the Treasury, and it is ours to dispose of as we choose.

Now we come to another class, the national-bank notes, and these have changed their appearance and shape and legal qualities from time to time according as Congress has touched them with the wand of its power. When the national banking system was founded there was a great necessity that there should be something done for the purpose of relieving the credit of the Government or rather of bringing to the support of the credit of the Government that of private capital and individual responsibility. That support was needed for our bonds. It was needed also for the greenback circulation, then largely in excess of the power of the Government to redeem it. In order to invite this credit in at that emergent time a scheme was arranged which in itself was very wise. Its constitutionality I have always doubted, but I should be simply insane were I to make an argument against it to-day after it has received the sanction of so many Congresses, of the Supreme Court on so many various occasions, and of every State tribunal in the United States which has ever touched the question for decision, for I have as yet to learn that there has been a single decision made denying the constitutionality of the national banking system. Therefore I am bound to yield whatever of predilection I may have had against the constitutionality of the measure to the aggregated wisdom of the people of the United States. I therefore proceed upon the basis, in what I have to say in reference to national banks, that they are thoroughly legitimate and thoroughly constitutional institutions of this country, a system that no man will ever be able to break down otherwise than by an argument against its tyrannical power or by presenting evidence of its uselessness to the people of the United States as a fiscal agency of this Government. They will stand, as the honorable Senator from Iowa said, sanctioned in judicial decision, so long as they are maintained by the experience of this country as being valuable adjutants for the carrying on of the commerce and the financial affairs of this great people. They are favorites of the people, not merely because they all have the same circulation and the same guarantee at the back of them of the Government of the United States, but because they are under the surveillance of Congress and of the agents of the Government, so that in looking after the affairs of the United States Government in connection with these banks we can reach still further and put in an oar in behalf of the depositors and other creditors of these banks. It may be a misfortune politically to the country that we have incorporated so much power into the hands of the national banks, but there it is, and I am here to deal with things, not as I would have had them but with things as I find them to be, as I know they must be in the future.

The national-bank notes that are issued to these banks by the Government of the United States were first made redeemable over the counters of the banks upon the penalty of bankruptcy and winding up in the event that they were not paid. Further experience taught us that that was perhaps an unnecessary provision except as an instrumentality for the purpose of destroying banks occasionally by a snap judgment.

It was found necessary then to modify to some extent this banking system, and what was that modification? The banks were also required to have certain reserves, and it was required that they should have other banks in which the reserve should be deposited as places or centers of redemption. That was seen to be a somewhat dangerous arrangement, because it transferred the real controlling power of the financial system of the national banks into a few of the large cities of this country, and Congress went on and made further modifications; and what was the last? It was that the national-bank note should be redeemed by the Treasury of the United States, a reserve of 5 per cent. of their circulation being held there for that purpose, and a very highly penal obligation resting upon the banks that in the event that they did not supply the deficiency and the Government should pay it they should be wound up. The Government became the sponsor for the redemption of these notes, and any man who holds a national-bank note now need not go elsewhere for its redemption except to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. Or the counter of the bank.

Mr. MORGAN. If I remember, a noteholder is not permitted to require payment at the counter of the bank.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes; he can go to the counter of the bank.

Mr. MORGAN. The main feature of the case, however, the valuable feature of the law, is the fact that the Government of the United States is responsible directly for the redemption of every dollar that may be issued by a national bank, although it has in pledge in its Treasury at the time of the redemption only 5 per cent. of the circulation. That is the truth about it. What, then, is that but a change of the nature of the obligation expressed on the face of the national-bank note from a conditional or collateral undertaking on the part of the United States to redeem to a direct obligation to pay the note? There is not a man in the United States to-day who holds the note of a national bank who does not hold the direct pledge of the Government of the United States for its payment; and if Senators will look at these statutes and give to them the construction that I think they are obliged to give to them they will find that the 10 per cent. difference between the amount of the bonds that are held and the amount of circulation that is held, even though that 10 per cent. might be lost, even though 20 per cent. of it might be lost, the obligation of the United States to redeem the notes remains for the full amount of every dollar that is issued to the national banks. I think, sir, there is no denial of this proposition, and I think we merely blindfold and deceive ourselves when we undertake to put the responsibility of the Government in a different light.

Here we are, then, after one change and another has been wrought by the hand of Congress in this system, with the national-bank notes resting upon us as direct obligations to be discharged out of the Treasury of the United States. That is the condition of our paper system at present—the greenbacks, the certificates of gold and silver, and the national-bank notes. We have in the Treasury one-third of the amount of money held in reserve necessary for the redemption of the greenbacks; we have dollar for dollar in the Treasury for the repayment of the gold and silver certificates; and we have our own bonds in hand to an amount exceeding 10 per cent. of the national-bank circulation that we have got out to indemnify us in the event of the failure of a bank to redeem its own circulation.

But none of these national-bank notes are redeemable in the first instance in coin. You must go to the Treasury of the United States and take lawful money for their redemption. They can give you gold or silver or legal-tender greenbacks, and then you must go either to the Treasury or to some subtreasury, and there you can demand the coin that you wish, if you desire to convert it into coin. It is a twofold process, somewhat involved in its movement. That has been a considerable fence to us, quite a protection.

I have no doubt that the coinage of silver has saved the people of the United States from having their credit destroyed in their own Treasury. I think it is the great fortress now behind which we are standing for the guard and protection of what we call the credit of the United States; that is to say, its ability to redeem this paper out of hand whenever it is presented. We have not got the money in hand to redeem our promises. We never shall see the day while any one of us occupies a seat on the floor of this honorable Senate when the Government of the United States will have in its coffers gold or silver enough to redeem at once the paper issues that are outstanding. We have got to provide some other expedient for getting along beside that of the ability to make actual redemption in coin of the whole mass of our debts at a given time. We have got to keep this money afloat in some way or other. If we do not keep it afloat it will sink us; for when the day comes that all this money is to be redeemed in coin out of the Treasury of the United States it will witness the bankruptcy of the Treasury. We are obliged to keep it afloat; we have no alternative. We are obliged to adopt the best system we can to keep it afloat. We have assumed the obligation, and we must keep it. How are you going to do this? That is the question to which our attention is invited by the remarks of the Comptroller of the Currency sent to us by the Secretary of the Treasury, where he says:

> It is evident that unless there is additional legislation the bonds held as security for circulation will rapidly diminish. New legislation may, however, postpone the payment of the public debt, or cause the profit on circulation to increase sufficiently to induce the national banks to invest in the long 4 percents, which are not to mature for a period of twenty-four years. The contraction of the bank circulation may be avoided by reduction of the redundant revenue, and there is no doubt that this is the true policy.

I concur with him most heartily in that. At the same time we have to keep up permanently the amount of money we now have in circulation, which is rated at a thousand million, making the national-bank currency about a third, the legal-tender currency about a third, and the balance in coin—there may be more; I do not know how to inform myself as to the exact amount of money in circulation in the United States. We have to assume the sum, and I assume a thousand million dollars as being about the actual amount. We have got 55,000,000 people, probably 60,000,000. We are increasing nearly at the rate of a million a year in population, and creating thereby a necessity for a continual increase of currency unless these people are to be impoverished. As we grow in numbers we must have a larger sum of money to maintain the per capita distribution of currency; otherwise our people will sag in their finances, become dull in their enterprises, heartless and poor.

Not only have we this increase, but was there ever such a picture presented to the fancy even of mortal man as the wonderful development of the industries of this country? Look at your Patent Office, sending out inventions by hundreds of thousands, the work of the genius of the inventors of this land. Look at the amount of money that is necessary to put these things into operation as they come to the front. We are actually astonishing ourselves, to say nothing of the other nations of the earth, with our progress. See how without the use of money this genius would perish for want of encouragement; see how this spirit of improvement would sink down into a spirit of despair We must have an increasing circulation in this country commensurate not merely with the increase of our population, but also commensurate to some extent at least with the rapid and wonderful development of our industry. Every new farm that is opened, yes, every ditch that is dug, every railroad that is built, every steamboat that is constructed and put to work, every machine that is invented and built, every mine that is opened, and every tree that is cut down for lumber requires some additional outlay of labor, which must have its representative in the circulation of the country. It is the very breath of life to the industries of this country, and to the extent that you deny it to the people in proper supply to that extent you produce impoverishment.

The contraction of the currency is something to which the Comptroller and Secretary of the Treasury look with great apprehension; and, although Senators may speak lightly of it here, it is felt to-day in every industry and every enterprise in this whole country. More than one-half of the stagnation that has taken place in this country in the last eight months has been due to the fact that the currency has been reduced or else due to the fear resting in the minds of financial men that the currency would be reduced. Men are afraid to venture, they are afraid to step out into new enterprises, they are afraid to put money anywhere, because money might become very dear and property very low, and they might find themselves in a pitfall.

So, sir, the call upon us for legislation is imperative, and I do not believe that any question has been presented to me since I have had the honor of a seat in this body that has made a more imperative and immediate demand upon my attention than this.

We must take care of this currency. Now how are we going to do it? The people of the United States, as I had the honor to remark yesterday evening, many of them, millions of them, are wedded to the idea that the national debt must be paid. They have borne the burden of this debt, its annual tax for interest, for so long a time that they have got an apprehension in respect of it which perhaps is not altogether justified by the facts, but still they feel that this debt must be paid, and this country is going forward to pay the debt. You will not be able to cut down your excess of $100,000,000 of revenue a year to that degree that the people shall become careless or negligent about paying the debt. They mean to pay it and get rid of the burden. Our national-bank system is based entirely, solely, rigidly, exclusively upon our national debt, and when that debt is gone the national banking system must necessarily go unless we supply it with some other support. We have got to cast about in some way to provide a new foundation for our paper money.

I have thought over the subject with as much care as I could, and I have reached the conclusion in my own mind that the best arrangement that could possibly be made with the banks would be this: That we would capitalize the interest to fall due on our maturing bonds, and issue to them in redemption of the bonds they now hold bonds running from fifty to one hundred years—it makes no difference about the length of time—without interest, so that those bonds would not be a burden on the tax-paying power of the people, and then, on the other hand, that we would do that which every sensible nation ought to do, to make its currency as free and as unembarrassed as possible, we would remove all taxation from the bonds, from the circulation, from the deposits, and from the capital stock of the banks. When you come to consider the municipal taxes and the State taxes the account would almost balance against the interest that we pay on the bonds. It is now almost a balance between these two propositions. That I would prefer to any plan that could be stated, and the people of the United States would be thoroughly satisfied with it. The banks would have the privileges that they now enjoy, and more than that, they would have the confidence and respect of the people; they would become valuable fiscal agents, more so even than they are to-day. I only suggest this as a plan that wiser men may mature into a system.

What is the next proposition? It is to extend the bonds and reduce the interest. I do not care if you reduce the interest to 1 per cent. per annum, the objection would remain, and it would be a cause of heart-burning and discontent between the people and the banks for years and years to come. It would be very much better if they could agree on the first proposition I have suggested, and yet I am not flattering myself that the time is yet, or perhaps that will be here in many years to come, when the banks will give their consent to an arrangement so just and equitable as this would be. The advantages they hold will not be readily yielded to any plan better suited to the welfare of the country.

But it appears now that under the pressure of the demand from the people for the payment of the public debt we must go on and pay it. We must pay it just as fast as we have the money in the Treasury to do it, and we have at least $100,000,000 more than is required by the sinking fund which we can contribute very largely, if not entirely, to the extin-guishment of this debt annually. And so it appears that this apprehension of the Comptroller and of the Secretary of the Treasury as to the contraction of the currency is really justified by the fact that we are paying off this national debt with such wonderful rapidity and that we have no stopping place in view.

Then, we must do something else to prevent the contraction of the currency. The committee have brought in a proposition that we shall extend the amount of issues upon the bonds which are deposited to secure circulation to 100 cents to the dollar, yielding to the banks the margin of 10 per cent. reserved as security. That is a wise and a just and a proper thing to do, and the truth is it should have been done long ago, because the Government of the United States cannot afford to discredit one class of its securities for the benefit of another. The Government puts out its national-bank notes and becomes responsible for their payment, and then turns around and says they are only worth 90 cents on the dollar of the bonds pledged to secure them. There never was any logic in that, there never was any sound basis of reasoning in that, and laws when they rest upon false logic and false reasoning are false laws; they lead to mischief oftener than otherwise. I have therefore no hesitancy in declaring by my vote that $100,000 of national-bank notes guaranteed by the faith and credit of the United States are worth any $100,000 of bonds that the United States has out. They are sums precisely equivalent to each other, because they are both based on the national credit and they each call for $100,000. There can be therefore no real difficulty in the adoption of the bill proposed by the committee.

I will not discuss the question of expanding this allowance of currency to the banks beyond the face value of the bonds held in pledge for its redemption, for that has now become a question that is no longer of importance, I think, in this debate.

I have had the misfortune to encounter criticism over the shoulders of my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] upon the proposition I had the temerity to bring forward in regard to State bonds. I will try to answer it.

What do we hold in the United States Treasury to-day as security for the bank bills we have out? We hold United States bonds as collateral security. That is all. The title is not in us. They are deposited in trust with us. We do not draw interest upon them; we pay it. When the bank is guilty of a defalcation of any kind we proceed to sell its bonds and we apply the proceeds of the sale to the redemption of the outstanding national-bank notes and the balance we pay over to the owner. So that our only relation to the bonds that are held on deposit in the Treasury of the United States is that of a creditor holding a collateral security. Is not that so? Shall we mystify ourselves with vain imaginations about a state of facts that does not exist or shall we realize the fact that we only hold these bonds as collateral security? They are very good security because we owe the debt, excellent security; but after a while this line of security must give out, and then we have got to adopt some other security.

Now I wish to compare the two securities that are presented in the amendments offered to this bill by the Senator from Kansas and myself the one with the other. The Senator from Kansas proposes a security of about 30 cents in the dollar in gold and silver coin, to be kept in reserve in the Treasury for the redemption of his Treasury notes. That is all. When the Senator from Kansas causes Treasury notes to be issued to fill up the deficit that may exist in the national-bank circulation by the withdrawal of that circulation, he puts in the place of it Treasury notes dollar for dollar, and what does he put there to secure the Treasury notes? He says we must keep in the Treasury a sufficient amount of money so as that these additional Treasury notes in connection with the greenback issues shall—I do not quote the language—not exceed the amount of that money more than three to one. When you hold one of these new Treasury notes that the Senator proposes to issue, or when you hold a greenback note for $100, what is your reliance for the payment of it? Is it the 33 cents to the dollar that is reserved in the Treasury to pay it or is it the credit of the United States? It is the credit of the United States that your reliance is based upon. We could at any time appropriate all the 33 cents to the dollar of the $100,000,000 kept in reserve to other purposes without affecting the value of the greenback or of the Treasury note the fraction of a cent, and there is not a Senator in the sound of my voice who does not know that fact; and yet we mystify ourselves with the vain imagination that that reserve held in the Treasury is the actual backbone of the credit for the redemption of these greenback and Treasury notes.

When the Senator from Kansas gets his new Treasury notes out we shall have a corresponding amount of coin, it may be gold, it may be silver, in the Treasury of the United States to the extent of one-third of the amount issued, and that is the fund to which he looks for redemption; that is the collateral security to the noteholder, and it is taxed out of the people.

Under the old pet-bank system of the States an issue of three to one was considered about a fair equivalent; but strong guards were put around the redemption fund that that should not be infringed. It was not allowed to be used in business at all; it was held in sacred trust for the redemption of the notes, and it was supposed that with one dollar you could pay three as fast as they would come in for redemption in the course of business. That is exactly the same calculation that we go upon in respect of the redemption of greenbacks and in respect of the redemption of the notes that the Senator from Kansas proposes to put out under his amendment. We conduct, merely in a new form, the old pet-bank system of the States. That is to say, we put in reserve one dollar to redeem three; precisely the category we are in now in relation to our paper money, and precisely the category in which the Senator from Kansas is willing to involve us still further. He is willing to issue any quantity that may be required to fill up all the deficiencies of currency occasioned by the withdrawal of national-bank notes, based on a fund in the Treasury equivalent to one-third of the amount thereof in coin.

Now when we come to weigh the security aside from the question of the faith of the Government, do we not perceive that after all the Senator's abhorrence of the pet-bank system of the States he falls right into it, for the pet-bank system of the States was "to put up a dollar of coin and issue three of paper." That is what we do now and what the Senator invites us to do; and yet he supposes, and actually boasts, that he is offering to the noteholder and the Government a better security than I propose in the amendment I had the honor to offer.

Sir, I have no ambition to invent a new scheme, and it is with great trepidation that I come forward to advance an idea upon the subject of putting in State bonds as collateral security, for the reason that I understand perfectly well that gentlemen who have gotten into a habit of thinking in a certain groove, especially when they pass a certain age, are always reluctant to get out of that groove. They feel unsafe and uncertain unless they are sailing in seas every part of which is mapped on the chart. I do not blame them for that, for caution in legislation is one of its very best elements, especially in financial legislation; and that is one reason why I am not prepared to swallow the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. If he had time to sit down and spend a month in studying the whole financial system, comparing every word of his amendment with the existing law, and considering what he proposes to accomplish by his amendment, I should have great faith in following his leadership; but sprung upon the spur of the occasion as it is, I am afraid to follow the Senator, because this is too delicate and dangerous a question.

But the Senator from Kansas has offered us no collateral security at all for the redemption of these new Treasury notes. He offers the Government no security but its taxing power and the noteholder no security except the Treasury. He can not point out anything else. I offer him the security of States that have got good bonds. I will call the list of the States with their bonded debts:

Mr. CULLOM. What is the amount for Illinois?

Mr. MORGAN. No amount is set down here to that State.

Mr. CULLOM. Illinois has no bonds outstanding.

Mr. MORGAN. Happy Illinois! Illinois is out of debt, Kentucky is almost out of debt, California is nearly out of debt, and some other States are out of debt entirely. The United States is not out of debt. The United States owes now thirteen hundred and odd millions of bonded debt besides the other debt.

I take it for granted that the States which are out of debt are rich, they are solvent and punctual. If I was the proud possessor of a million dollars and did not know what to do with it—and I should be very apt to be in that category if I had a million dollars—I do not know any better use I could make of it than to ask the State of Illinois to borrow it from me at about 5 per cent. I should think that was the very best investment I could make possibly, and when I got those bonds and took them into the market I would instantly realize in the city of New York one hundred and twenty-five for each one hundred dollars. Everybody knows that.

Mr. CULLOM. Illinois is not borrowing.

Mr. MORGAN. No, she is not borrowing. Her credit is good, and the credit of those States that have for the last five years punctually paid their interest on their bonded debt is as good to-day on the market as the credit of the United States, and their bonds are just as good collateral in the hands of any man who has money to loan or money to issue as the bonds of the Government of the United States.

I put grave restrictions about this matter in my amendment because it is only a starting point. This is a tentative and experimental effort, but, Senators, it looks in a direction that opens up to my mind at least a vista of future prosperity that is very inviting. I can see in it very much of good and nothing of harm. I can see no danger in respect of it whatever, unless it may be the profligacy of legislation. If we wish to be profligate in legislation, if that is our bent and our drift, if that idea characterizes the history of the Senate of the United States for the past twenty years in respect of our financial legislation, have we not in the amendment of the Senator from Kansas ample opportunity for profligacy? Sir, we can expand and have expanded the capability of the banks to issue their notes ad infinitum, bounded by nothing upward except the amount of our public debt. We have admitted the deposit of any amount of gold and silver bullion and coin and the issue of certificates thereupon. But, sir, there was never more conservatism and caution even by the wisest parent, who upon his death-bed was disposing of his affairs for the benefit of his posterity, than Congress has exercised in respect to the financial system of the country. Not one single hint at profligacy has ever come into either House with any success; no raid has ever been voted by either House of Congress, and I am glad to bear that testimony, upon the financial system of the country.

Then why do Senators fall into a state of apprehension amounting almost to despair when they dream of the profligacy that may lead men to legislate to receive State bonds that are bad, or county bonds or municipal bonds, as the Senator from Kansas will have it, in the course of our dealing with this question? No, sir; there is no danger of profligacy. You take a State bond like the bond of Connecticut or Massachusetts or Pennsylvania; I will take that State, if you please, the State of Pennsylvania, the old Keystone State, where the people have as much respect for their credit as we have in this Senate Chamber for the credit of the United States Government. Take their bonds. They draw interest from the State of Pennsylvania and not from the United States. If you go to the Treasury of the United States and say to the Treasurer, "I have got a million and a quarter of dollars of Pennsylvania bonds, and I propose, inasmuch as Pennsylvania pays me interest regularly upon these bonds, that I will deposit them with you as collateral security in the Treasury for $1,000,000 of your national-bank notes under the same laws and conditions that now exist." If that United States Treasurer were a wise man and had the power to act he would never hesitate to say, "I will take that as good and ample security, particularly as the capital stock you have invested in your bank is also pledged to the noteholders for the redemption of the notes."

Mr. ALLISON. And all the assets.

Mr. MORGAN. All the assets of the banks are pledged just as they are now. I say that Treasurer, if he were a wise man and had the option to act, would say to the holder of that million and a quarter of Pennsylvania bonds, "That is good security, and you shall have a million of dollars of currency issued upon them." I am not afraid of that. Pennsylvania has paid her interest for five years regularly on her bonds. You can not crowd a new issue in. It is good security.

It is true you can not compel Pennsylvania to pay those bonds; neither can you compel the United States to pay its bonds; and from the standpoint of the noteholder—the man who holds the circulation of the national banks—when he comes to compare the legal capability of forcing a redemption of what he holds he finds himself as powerless in one case as in the other. He turns to the State of Pennsylvania and says: "I can not force you to pay these bonds; neither can the Government of the United States force you to it; but, on the other hand, I can not force the Government of the United States to pay its bonds." These things do not rest on the legal remedy that the noteholder has got. Let us not deceive ourselves about that; they rest only upon the faith and credit of the Government.

Suppose we had a law to permit the lodgment of this million and a quarter of Pennsylvania bonds in the Treasury of the United States and the issue thereupon of a million dollars of national-bank issue that the Government of the United States guarantees the payment of just as it does now, then we will take the noteholder's position again; what does he say to himself? "I hold $100,000 of this money; is it good?" "Yes." "Why?" "Because the Government of the United States guarantees it." "What other security have you here?" "The faith and credit of another great Commonwealth."

I hope that I shall live to see the day when all of this grand body of independent, sovereign, and confederated States will be able to boast in the presence of the world that the credit and faith of each one of them is equal to that of the Central Government. They will be out of debt before long, and that is the chief difficulty in this proposition that I make. They will be soon entirely out of debt. The aggregate amount as I believe of the bonded debts of the States proper is not in excess of $300,000,000. More than that, no State, according to the provisions of the amendment which I present here, whose bonds are below par in the market has a right to have its bonds pledged for the security of circulation; that is to say no holder of such bonds can do it. What is the effect of that? We have got some States that have been lacerated with the question of State indebtedness. The reconstructed States of the South are some of them in that condition. My own State was in that condition, Arkansas still is to some extent in that condition, and Virginia is and Louisiana is, and even Georgia if she could be vexed about such a matter would be in a little vexation about the outstanding account of some contentious people who claim that they have a just demand, which I do not believe, against that State.

What would be the effect now of marshaling all the States upon a record in the Treasury of the United States as to whose bonds are entitled to that sort of faith and credit which would cause them to be accepted or rejected by the Government of the United States as collateral security for the issue of the national-bank money? Why, sir, every State in this Union, instead of hedging about to try to find means to evade and avoid the payment of its debts, would, from a common sense of honor, each emulating the pride of its sisters, step forward and do all that might be necessary for the purpose of building up its credit. That would be the effect.

Moreover, it would accomplish that other result which I so much desire, and that is a recognition by the Government of the United States of the honor and the dignity and the power of these State governments. Perhaps I am more zealous about them than they are about it themselves, for I believe the worst abuse of State rights that exists in the United States to-day is by the neglect of the States themselves. There is less disposition to raid the rights of the States in the Congress of the United States to-day than there is on the part of the States to surrender them for a compensation or for an easement of their burdens.

But, sir, this sort of recognition which we should give to the States in their public faith and credit, which is the best interpreter of the true character of a people, would have a tendency to raise them up in strength and in power, and it would increase the harmony of the associations of these different States. I therefore claim only for my proposition that it presents ample security for the issue of national-bank notes, and that it relieves the Government of the United States to that extent of the payment of interest, the States themselves being responsible for the interest, and the United States accepting their bonds as safe collateral security.

I have another provision in this amendment by which we can go into the market and sell the bonds if they depreciate below par. I have left a blank in my amendment by which we can say at what percentage of the face value of the bonds they shall be received. My own conviction is that we had better start at 75 cents on the dollar. That is entirely safe. A Pennsylvania bond deposited at 75 cents on the dollar of its face would be good security; and in that way we can supply that support for the banks which we are bound to take from under them in consequence of the demand of the people for the payment of the national debt. We can thereby accommodate all views and phases of opinion, and we can put beneath these national banks foundations stronger than they have to-day, and yet not at the cost to the people of the United States of one stiver in the way of taxation.

I will not enlarge further upon this question, Mr. President. I do not know that I should have spoken a third of the time I have occupied but for the castigation which the honorable Senator from Kansas gave to my amendment over the shoulders of the Senator from Iowa. I expected to hear him rise, of course, to defend himself, but it is well known that the Senator from Iowa is patient and forbearing, and, loving his friend from Kansas, he thought that he would not retort upon him in the manner in which the Senator from Kansas seemed disposed to remark upon him and his views of our financial policy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. BROWN. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 2, after the word "surrendered," it is proposed to insert—

In consequence of the call and payment of any bonds of the United States pledged to secure such circulation—

So as to read:

That whenever the circulation of any national bank, or the legal-tender greenbacks held by any national bank, or any portion thereof, shall be surrendered in consequence of the call and payment, &c.

Mr. MORGAN. I omitted to say that the object of that amendment is to make the amendment of the Senator from Kansas applicable only to cases where bonds are called and paid and not to those cases where the banks change their condition by voluntary surrender of their charters or otherwise.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I should like some explanation of the language employed in the amendment that was introduced while I was absent temporarily from the Chamber this morning as to the meaning of the term "legal-tender greenbacks." I have not been aware in the course of somewhat extensive reading on this subject that "greenbacks" is a statutory term. There has been a popular definition or description of a certain character of United States Treasury notes that has been employed, and which might perhaps be suitably employed in anything except a statute, but I doubt whether any Senator would want to vote to incorporate into a statutory enactment the words "legal-tender greenback." I do not know how the amendment came to be incorporated.

Mr. PLUMB. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken. There is no such amendment. The word "greenback" does not occur in it unless it is embraced in part of the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Secretary read it again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to have the whole amendment reported?

Mr. PLUMB. The reference must be to an amendment proposed to be incorporated, but not yet incorporated.

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment to which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] refers was suggested by the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] this morning and accepted by the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] as a modification of that Senator's amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. So I understood.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it reported.

Mr. PLUMB. Does it include the word "greenback?"

Mr. HARRIS. I understand it does include it.

Mr. PLUMB. Then it was a slip of the Clerk. It was not either in the amendment of the Senator from Alabama or in the modification that I made. The word "greenback" was not used at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported as offered.

Mr. PLUMB. "Legal-tender notes" was the language and not "legal-tender greenbacks."

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That whenever the circulation of any national bank or the legal-tender greenbacks held by any national bank or any portion thereof.

Mr. PLUMB. That is a mistake of the Clerk. The word "notes" was used, not "greenbacks."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That whenever the circulation of any national bank, or the legal-tender greenbacks held by any national bank, or any portion thereof, shall be surrendered, or legal-tender notes of the United States shall have been deposited for the redemption thereof, and the same is not taken up by other national banks within thirty days thereafter, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the proposed amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. PLUMB. The word "greenback" occurs there by the fault of the Clerk, and not by the fault of any one who made the proposition. I suggest that it be corrected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How does the Senator suggest that it be corrected?

Mr. PLUMB. As it did not get there by any suggestion of mine, I have no suggestion now to make about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair has been recently called to it and has no knowledge of the matter.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand the amendment was suggested by the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], to whom his colleague recently referred in terms of facetious playfulness as a member of the new Committee on Finance. If the Senator from Kansas, my colleague, does not desire to modify this language, I am sure nobody will want to vote for it, because it would be a burlesque to ask us to incorporate into a statute the term "greenback," which is merely a popular definition or description of a species of our national currency otherwise defined.

Mr. PLUMB. I am sure the word "greenback" was not used either by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] or myself. It has got in simply by some mistake in transcribing.

Mr. HARRIS. In justification of the clerk I desire to say that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] while occupying the floor suggested three distinct amendments that he proposed to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. A colloquy occurred between the two Senators. The clerk took down as best he could the amendments proposed or suggested by the Senator from Alabama, and after some conversation between the two Senators the modification was agreed upon, the clerk having incorporated the language he thought was used by the junior Senator from Alabama, and after the modification was made the Chair ordered the Clerk to report, and the Clerk reported the amendment as it had been modified. I make that statement in justification of the Clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk has handed to the Chair the original amendment submitted by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. INGALLS. Let that be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will report the first amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

The CHIEF CLERK. It was proposed to amend by inserting after the word "bank," in the first line, the following:

Or the legal-tender greenbacks held by any national bank.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the exact language used in the amendment.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I will state the fact of this matter. It is clearly owing to an omission on the part of the Senator from Alabama. I called his attention to the statutory term, and he replied that he would ask to have it modified in order to be correct.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Kansas can modify it now.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator from Alabama has left the Chamber, and I suppose there is no objection to the modification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no motion before the Senate in relation to this particular subject. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. PLUMB. The trouble has arisen from the fact that the clerk has mistakenly copied both the amendment of the Senator from Alabama and my own, while it was agreed that the amendment which I proposed in furtherance of the idea the Senator from Alabama had should take the place of his entirely.

Mr. PUGH. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not understand that the clerk is in any fault in this matter, if there is any fault in it. I understood the Senator from Alabama to offer the amendment in the exact language reported. I happened to be paying some attention at that moment to the Senator from Alabama. Just now the Chair had read from the desk in the handwriting of the Senator from Alabama the exact language used by the clerk. Am I mistaken in that? If that be true, then I do not think the clerk ought to be charged with any dereliction of his duty in reference to this amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Alabama withdrew his amendment and an amendment of my own, designed to accomplish the same object which the Senator from Alabama had in view, was to take its place. The clerk, oblivious of that, has simply reported both amendments; that is all; and the first amendment which was offered by the Senator from Alabama has been erroneously incorporated in the proposition.

Mr. PUGH. The question was whether I would accept the change proposed by the Senator from Kansas in the amendment I offered. I saw no difference in the legal effect, but merely in the use of descriptive words. So I accepted his amendment in place of my own.

Mr. MCPHERSON. There should be no confusion about this. If I understand aright, the Senator from Alabama proposed an amendment to come in after the word "banks," in the second line. It was modified by the Senator from Kansas to come in at a different place and in different language although to accomplish the same purpose, and this was accepted by the Senator from Alabama as a substitute for his own amendment. That is the way I understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). If the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] will withdraw temporarily his amendment, it will be in order for any Senator to move the amendment that is desired to put the phraseology in any form that may be determined upon.

Mr. MORGAN. I withdraw it then for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Alabama withdraws his amendment for the present. Now it is in order, if any Senator chooses, to move an amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I move then to strike out what is reported there as the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator come to the desk or dictate from his stand the amendment he desires?

Mr. PLUMB. The Clerk has it in pencil.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will report the proposed amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH].

The SECRETARY. After the word "bank," in the second line of the amendment of Mr. PLUMB, the words "or the legal-tender greenbacks held by any national bank" were inserted.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to strike out all those words.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I now offer my amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. Let us see how it would read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 2, after the word "surrendered," it is proposed to insert "in consequence of the call and payment of any bonds of the United States pledged to secure such circulation;" so as to read:

That whenever the circulation of any national bank, or any portion thereof, shall be surrendered in consequence of the call and payment of any bonds of the United States pledged to secure such circulation, or legal-tender notes of the United States shall have been deposited for the redemption thereof, and the same is not taken up by other national banks within thirty days thereafter, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] renews the amendment heretofore reported as offered by him, and the question is upon agreeing to that amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. The object of my amendment, I beg to state again, is to limit the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to notes issued on those bonds that have been called and paid.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] as modified.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be reported as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That whenever the circulation of any national bank, or any portion thereof, shall be surrendered, or legal-tender notes of the United States shall have been deposited for the redemption thereof, and the same is not taken up by other national banks within thirty days thereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon issue an equivalent amount of Treasury notes of the denominations now provided by law for national-bank notes. Said Treasury notes shall be deposited in the Treasury and paid out as other moneys kept for the discharge of the obligations of the Government, except the interest or principal of the public debt. They shall be receivable for salaries and for all dues to the Government, including duties on imports; shall be a legal tender between national banks, and for all debts due to any national bank; shall be redeemable in coin, as the legal-tender notes of the United States now are; and when received into the Treasury they shall be reissued, and when mutilated or worn they shall be replaced, in the same manner as now provided by law for said legal-tender notes. The coin held in the Treasury at the date of the passage of this act for the redemption of the legal-tender notes of the Government shall also be applicable to the redemption of the Treasury notes herein provided for; and such coin reserve may, from time to time, be increased by adding thereto other sums from payments made into the Treasury, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That the total amount of said coin reserve shall never be less than 25 per cent. nor more than 30 per cent. of the total amount of legal-tender and Treasury notes outstanding. The true intent and meaning of this section being that the volume of paper money outstanding (exclusive of gold and silver certificates) shall not be diminished by the payment of the interest-bearing bonds of the United States.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, a single word. The addition of this amendment to the bill proposed by the Committee on Finance would clearly mean nothing less than a new issue of legal-tender notes, instead of an amendment to the law proposing to continue with less difficulty the national banking system.

I call attention to the fact that it appears upon the face of this amendment in lines 10 and 11 that the notes issued under this provision "shall be receivable for salaries and for all dues to the Government, including duties on imports," while we have a present law which provides that nothing but gold and silver shall be so received. It also provides that they "shall be a legal tender between national banks, and for all debts due to any national bank."

Is it worth while at this late day, after the necessities of the Government are over, for us to undertake to provide a new legal tender for the support of the Government or for the support of the national banks?

This is an entirely different question from that proposed by the committee, and I trust that it will be voted down, and that very emphatically.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on the question of agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK (when Mr. BAYARD'S name was called). The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is necessarily absent to-day. He is paired upon all these questions with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. The Senator from Delaware instructed me to say that he would vote "nay" on this proposition if he were present.

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have been requested to pair with my colleague [Mr. VOORHEES], who is absent on account of sickness in his family. If he were present, I should vote "nay." I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. GIBSON (when Mr. JONAS'S name was called). The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON].

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD]. I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. Tho junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] was necessarily called away, and asked me to pair with him on this question. I understand that if he were present he would on this amendment vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—15.

Dolph,	Hill,	Sherman,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL. There is a substitute offered by me, which I ask may be now acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the substitute offered by the Senator from Vermont.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and to insert:

SEC. —. That any deposit, already or hereafter made, of United States bonds as required by law, any banking association making the same shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations, in blank, registered and countersigned as provided by law, as follows: On United States 4 per cent. bonds deposited prior to January 1, 1890, an amount in the whole equal to 110 per cent. of the par value of such bonds: Provided, That the issue of circulating notes upon the 4 per cent. bonds deposited or held in the first year succeeding January 1, 1890, shall not exceed 109 per cent. of the par value of such bonds, and that the issue on such 4 per cent. bonds deposited or held in each succeeding year shall be 1 per cent. less than in the year preceding, until the limit of issue of such circulating notes is reduced to par: And provided further, That on the deposit of any bonds of the United States now authorized by law, except as herein otherwise provided, circulating notes may be issued to an amount not exceeding the par value of such bonds; and at no time shall the total amount of such notes issued to any association exceed the amount at such time actually paid in of its capital stock.

SEC. 2. That associations organized for the purpose of issuing notes payable in gold under the provisions of section 5185 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, upon the deposit of any United States bonds bearing interest payable in gold with the Treasurer of the United States, shall be entitled to receive circulating notes to the amount and in the manner prescribed in this act for other national banking associations.

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws of the United States inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. MORRILL. It will be observed that this measure agrees with the measure of the committee as reported by the Senator from Delaware in relation to all the bonds except the 4 per cent. bonds; that on those the Government is bound to pay $23 in a hundred more than upon 3 per cent. bonds. It proposes a higher rate of circulation for the banks, and it also proposes to allow the banks which have been organized upon a gold basis to have the same privileges as other national banks.

Mr. MCPHERSON. It will be remembered and understood by the Senate that this amendment stands on all-fours with the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], in that it proposes to issue circulation in excess of the face value of the bonds. That is all I wish to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], but as he votes "nay" and I vote "nay" on this proposition, the pair is transferred to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY]. I vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HARRISON (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted inadvertently when the roll was called. I desire to withdraw my vote and to announce again my pair with my colleague [Mr. VOORHEES].

Mr. BROWN. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE].

Mr. COCKRELL. As announced on the previous vote, I am paired with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. If he were present, I understand that he would vote for this amendment; I should vote against it.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Aldrich,	Dawes,	Manderson,	Pike,
Allison,	Edmunds,	Miller of Cal.,	Platt,
Blair,	Hale,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sawyer,
Bowen,	Logan,	Mitchell,	Sewell,
Cullom,	Mahone,	Morrill,	Van Wyck.

NAYS—36.

Beck,	Garland,	Jackson,	Pendleton,
Butler,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Plumb,
Call,	Gibson,	Kenna,	Pugh,
Camden,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Coke,	Groome,	McMillan,	Riddleberger,
Colquitt,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Sabin,
Conger,	Harris,	Maxey,	Vest,
Dolph,	Hill,	Morgan,	Walker,
Farley,	Ingalls,	Palmer,	Wilson.

ABSENT—20.

Anthony,	Cockrell,	Hoar,	Sherman,
Bayard,	Fair,	Jonas,	Slater,
Brown,	Frye,	Jones of Nevada,	Vance,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harrison,	Lapham,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Saulsbury,	Williams.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL. I now move as an amendment the section providing for the circulation of the gold banks, making it the same as others, to which I think there will be no objection from any part of the Chamber. I offer that as an additional section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont will be reported.

Mr. BUTLER. We can not hear on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. MORRILL. I will state again, if Senators on the other side did not hear my motion, that the gold banks which have been established under national law do not now receive, and can not receive, unless some provision shall be made for them, over 80 per cent. upon any bonds that may be deposited by them. I offer an amendment placing them upon the same footing as other national banks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add, as an additional section to the bill, the following:

SEC. —. That associations organized for the purpose of issuing notes payable in gold under the provisions of section 5185 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, upon the deposit of any United States bonds bearing interest payable in gold with the Treasurer of the United States, shall be entitled to receive circulating notes to the amount and in the manner prescribed in this act for other national banking associations.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Vermont what bonds we have that are payable in gold?

Mr. MORRILL. All our bonds, I suppose, are payable in gold, but these banks are organized upon the principle that they shall issue no circulation except that payable in gold, and they are therefore restricted to 80 per cent. of circulation instead of 90 per cent. allowed to other banks. This merely provides that they shall be placed upon the same footing as other banks. There can be no objection to it.

Mr. MORGAN. But the Senator's amendment in line 4 reads:

Upon the deposit of any United States bonds bearing interest payable in gold.

I am not aware that we have any such bonds.

Mr. BECK. We have none.

Mr. MORRILL. I think that is a mistake in the draught. The words "payable in gold" should be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be reported as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 5, it is proposed to strike out the words "payable in gold;" so as to read:

Upon the deposit of any United States bonds bearing interest with the Treasurer of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I wish to call attention to a correction of the phraseology of the bill. Seemingly there was an omission, so that it did not correctly state the object and purpose of the bill. It appeared in the bill as though it would not apply to banks already in existence, and enable them to take out their circulation to the extent of the extra 10 per cent. That phraseology has been corrected by several verbal amendments that I submitted some days ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the Senator from New Jersey suggested certain verbal amendments, but they have never been acted on nor have they been understood as formally offered.

Mr. MCPHERSON. They were sent to the desk of the Secretary as having been offered by me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the first amendment referred to by the Senator from New Jersey.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 3 of the original bill, after the word "upon," it is proposed to strike out "a" and insert in lieu thereof "any," and after the word "deposit" to insert "already or hereafter made;" so as to read:

That upon any deposit already or hereafter made of any United States bonds bearing interest, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection these amendments will be agreed to. They are agreed to. The next amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 8, after the word "in," it is proposed to insert the words "the whole;" so as to read, "not exceeding in the whole the par value of the bonds deposited."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment will be agreed to. It is agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I now offer the amendment that I referred to as additional sections to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment heretofore offered by the Senator from Alabama will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as additional sections the following:

SEC. —. That when any bonds of the United States deposited in the Treasury by a banking association to secure its circulation are called and paid by the Government, such banking association shall have the right to substitute in the place thereof bonds issued by any of the States; and the bonds so deposited, as to their assignment, management, control, sale, or disposal, shall in all respects be subject to the laws which govern the said banking associations and the officers and agents of the United States with respect to the bonds for which said State bonds are substituted, so far as the same are applicable. But said bonds of the States shall not be received as a substitute for bonds of the United States, so called, and paid at a rate exceeding—per centum of their value on the face thereof; nor shall the bonds of any State be received on deposit unless the interest theretofore accrued on the same for the period of five years previous to such deposit shall have been duly paid; nor shall any such bonds be so received on deposit when the same are worth less than par in the city of New York.

SEC. —. That the interest accruing on such State bonds after the same are assigned and deposited in accordance with this act shall be received by the Treasurer of the United States and placed to the credit of the banking association that has deposited the bonds, and shall be paid over to such banking association, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct that the same shall be retained in the Treasury to make good any depreciation in the value of the State bonds deposited by such banking association, or because of the failure of any banking association to provide funds as required by law to redeem its circulation, or because of its failure to pay any sum of money that may be charged to such banking association on the books of the Treasury Department.

SEC. —. That at any time that the Secretary of the Treasury shall conclude that a sale of such State bonds so deposited is necessary for the security or protection of the Government of the United States in respect of the redemption of the circulation which such bonds are deposited to secure, he shall proceed to cause said bonds to be sold, in the open market in New York, to the highest bidder for cash; and such sale shall convey a complete title to said bonds to the purchaser; but no such sale shall be made until after thirty days from the date of a notice that the Secretary of the Treasury shall give to the banking association that has deposited such State bonds, requiring such banking association to redeem said bonds by the deposit in the Treasury of the sum of lawful money of the United States equal to so much of the circulation of such banking association as such State bonds were deposited to secure. And if, after the sale of such bonds, any deficit remains in the sum required to redeem the circulation of any such banking association to the extent that the same is based upon and secured by such bonds, such banking association shall pay the same into the Treasury of the United States within thirty days after it has been notified of the amount of the deficit by the Secretary of the Treasury; and failing so to pay such deficit, such banking association shall forfeit its charter and shall be put into liquidation, in accordance with the laws governing the winding up of such associations.

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations for carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator from Alabama will yield to me, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORGAN. I will yield for that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 20, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Monday.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Clerk omit the reading of the titles of bills introduced.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

The remainder of the Journal was read and approved.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. DUNN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the preamble and resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the public lands are the property of the people of the United States, who are chiefly interested in a proper, just, and equitable distribution of them in such manner as will enable all desiring to engage in agriculture to do so as land-owners and not as tenants; and

Whereas the public domain has been and still is being absorbed with alarming rapidity by fraudulent settlements, purchases, and entries, made possible by the existing settlement and disposition laws and by enormous grants of public lands heretofore made by Congress to States and corporations to aid in the construction of railroads; and

Whereas it is alleged and publicly charged that in the administration of the laws making these grants by the officers of the United States entries of lands made by actual settlers have been unlawfully canceled for the benefit of the land-grant railroad corporations, that patents issued to such settlers have been in like manner unlawfully recalled and annulled for their benefit, that favoritism and partiality have been shown in deciding questions between actual settlers and such corporations to the great advantage of the corporations and to the injury of the settlers, that such corporations have been unlawfully permitted to change the location of their roads, that patents for lands have been issued to such corporations without authority of law and lists of lands unlawfully certified to States for the benefit of such corporations, and that fraudulent and corrupt means were employed to secure grants of public lands by Congress to certain corporations to aid in the construction of railroads: Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee of seven be appointed, to inquire into what changes should be made in the laws touching the administration of the public lands, and into the administration of the laws touching such land grants as aforesaid, and into all the matters above set forth. Said committee is authorized to send for persons and papers, to examine witnesses and take testimony, and to employ a stenographer and messenger at the usual rate of compensation, while actually employed, whose compensation, together with the fees of the witnesses summoned, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, upon the certificate of the chairman and one member of the minority of said committee, in conformity with law. Said committee shall make full report to the House on the subjects submitted, and the testimony taken shall accompany such report and may, if deemed necessary, report bills touching the administration of the public lands, and shall have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am willing that the Committee on Public Lands shall inquire into all these matters and am willing to give them all the power that is conferred by the resolution, provided the investigation be made by that committee.

The SPEAKER. There is objection.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then I demand the regular order. I do not object to this resolution, but if objection be made to it I demand the regular order, that the House may reach the consideration of the pending appropriation bill. Nearly three months of the session have gone and not a single appropriation bill has passed the House.

Mr. DUNN. Do I understand that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] objects to the present consideration of the resolution which I offered?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I said I was willing, and I believe everybody else is willing, that the Committee on Public Lands shall make that inquiry.

The SPEAKER. That is an objection.

Mr. DUNN. That committee has more to do now than it can accomplish.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I am informed that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] desires to submit a resolution that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors be permitted to sit during the session of the House. I am willing to withhold the demand for the regular order that the gentleman may submit that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee can not withdraw the demand for the regular order merely to admit a motion by the gentleman from Kentucky. If he withdraws the demand he must withdraw it absolutely.

Several members called for the regular order.

STAR-ROUTE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. MONEY. I desire to make a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report back the resolution which I send to the desk with the recommendation that it be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, required to transmit to this House the papers called for in the resolution of the 30th instant, as follows, to wit:

"Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to this House all reports made by special agents of the Post-Office Department to the Postmaster-General during the year 1881 having reference to the star-route investigation and which have not heretofore been published and made public."

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. I desire to state before this resolution is acted upon that some weeks ago a resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] calling for substantially this information, together with other information. The Postmaster-General addressed a letter to the Speaker of the House to the effect that he believed it would be detrimental to the public service to make known the information sought for by that resolution. Some days afterward the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, they having reported a resolution introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] for the same information substantially, received a letter also from the Postmaster-General, in which he said in substance that inasmuch as the resolution introduced by the gentleman from New York called for substantially the same information as was sought by the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois, he would not transmit the information until the further direction of the House. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads had that information before them when this resolution was considered by the committee. Notwithstanding the resolution had been previously reported to the House and the letter of the Postmaster-General with reference thereto, the Post-Office Committee again brings back the resolution and directs the Postmaster-General without discretion to send that information to the House. Now what I desire to say is this: That the Postmaster-General has said that the giving of this information might, and probably would, be detrimental to the public service. If this House insists upon this information being given with no discretion whatever in the Postmaster-General as to what shall not be made public, then the House alone takes the responsibility for the information that may be disclosed and the consequences that may follow.

Mr. MONEY. I ask that the report of the committee accompanying the resolution be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the resolution of February 11, 1884, requiring the Postmaster-General to send certain papers to the House of Representatives, report the same with favorable recommendation, and submit the following reasons therefor:

The Postmaster-General, in his communication of the 1st instant to the resolution of the House dated the 30th ultimo, referring to his communication of the 25th ultimo replying to the House resolution of the 17th ultimo, says:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 1, 1884.

SIR: The resolution of the 30th ultimo, directing that the reports made by special agents during the year 1881 having reference to the star-route investigation be transmitted to the House of Representatives, has been received.

Having no information as to the views of the House on the suggestions submitted in my communication of the 25th ultimo in response to the resolution therein referred to, and as the resolution to which I am now required to respond substantially covers the same subjects and calls for the same information as the former resolution, I deem it a proper courtesy to the House and in just consideration for the public interest to await the further action of your honorable body before transmitting the papers called for.

I beg leave to state that I have directed that the papers should be in readiness in order that there may be no delay in forwarding them should the House, upon further consideration of the subject and in view of my letter of the 25th ultimo, deem it expedient and proper that they should be submitted to public inspection.

Very respectfully,

W. Q. GRESHAM, Postmaster-General.

Hon. J. G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The Postmaster-General says, in his letter of the 25th replying to the House resolution of 17th January:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 25, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 17th instant, requesting copies of all correspondence between this Department and the Department of Justice touching the prosecution of persons charged with frauds in connection with the star-route mail service; a statement of the names of individuals found to be indebted to the United States, and the amount of the indebtedness of each in consequence of such frauds, and also an itemized statement of expenditures in the Post-Office Department from March 4, 1881, to January 1, 1884, in the investigation and prosecution of such frauds.

The itemized statement of expenditures is now being prepared and will be transmitted as early as possible.

I addressed a communication to the Attorney-General showing the names of individuals found to be indebted to the United States, with the names and residences of witnesses who will be able to testify in behalf of the Government, and I deem it proper Congress shall know that the publication of this letter in advance of the commencement of suits might and probably would be detrimental to the public interests. If, however, Congress shall think otherwise, the desired information will be furnished without delay.

Very respectfully,

W. Q. GRESHAM,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. J. G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The reason for withholding the papers called for is that publication of this matter "in advance of the commencement of suits might and probably would be detrimental to the public interests." We have no information that it is intended to bring any suits, nor are we warranted by the history of suits already brought that the Government would make any recovery of the money fraudulently obtained by any contractor on these star-routes. The Department of Justice has selected presumably the best cases for prosecution, and has availed itself of the ablest special counsel, has employed special agents and detectives, and spent great sums of money, amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars, as shown by official reports. Not a man in these three years has been convicted or a dollar recovered. Criminal prosecutions are now barred, and it can hardly be believed in the face of these facts that a dollar will ever be recovered. The committee is considering a bill to regulate the letting of contracts to carry the mail on star-routes, and it is important that the special information put by the special agents of the Post-Office Department in the reports upon this class of service, which are the reports called for, should be before the committee for its consideration. Believing that the Government will not lose any money by reason of any failure caused by the production of these papers, and that the public interest will be highly subserved by the use of these reports by the committee, we recommend that the Postmaster-General be again required to furnish said reports to this House.

Mr. MONEY rose.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Will the gentleman from Mississippi allow me just a word?

Mr. MONEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I do not rise at this moment to oppose the resolution or report, but simply to say that my colleague on the committee Mr. BINGHAM of Pennsylvania has some documents and papers prepared which he desired to present when this report should be brought up. He is not in his seat. I understand he is detained by sickness in his family. On the part of the minority of the committee I ask the chairman to withhold the consideration of the report until the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] can be present.

Mr. MONEY. I would be very glad to accede to the request of my colleague on the committee; but this is a privileged report, and the rule of the House requires that it be made within one week from the reference of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that if he chooses the report may be allowed to lie over, and can be called up at another time.

Mr. MONEY. I would prefer, in view of the remarks of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PEELLE], to submit at this time some few remarks on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. MONEY. I think I perfectly appreciate the reasons given by the Postmaster-General for withholding the papers called for until a further demand is made by this House. It is perfectly proper that he should have replied to the resolution in the first instance as he has done. He simply desires to protect himself from the responsibility for any failure that may occur by the publication of these papers. It is simply for the House to say whether it will take the responsibility, if any, that may come from such a course.

There is only one way in which the public interest can suffer from the production and publication of these papers, and that is stated in the Postmaster-General's report, in which he refers to the itemized statement of the indebtedness of those persons who it is said obtained fraudulently from the Government money upon contracts for the star routes, the names of witnesses, and the statement of what they are expected to prove, and the reports of agents employed in these cases.

For three years the Department of Justice has been prosecuting suits against the star-route contractors. They have expended, as I am told and as will be shown by their own reports, several hundred thousand dollars. They have selected the cases most favorable for prosecution. The time for criminal prosecution is past. No man can now be brought to account criminally for any share he may have had in the fraudulent transactions exposed by the Department in these prosecutions.

In all these suits, in which hundreds of thousands of dollars have been expended, special counsel retained, special detectives and agents employed, not a single conviction has yet been had. No man has yet been made to disgorge one single dollar fraudulently obtained of the Government by the administration of the Contract Office during the last seven or eight years.

That is the issue of suits most favorable to the Government and prosecuted with all the talent that can be commanded by the resources of the Government. What can we now expect in the less favorable cases yet unprepared in the Department of Justice? I say there is nothing whatever in the reason alleged that can work to the detriment of the public interest.

The committee over which I have the honor to preside has under consideration a bill to revise the legislation upon the subject of letting and subletting contracts on the various star routes. In order to correct the laws that now govern the matter, to do away with the abuses of the contract system which have grown up under those laws, it is the intention of the committee honestly to inquire into these things so far as that can be effected by us in order to ascertain the best method of correcting the evils of this system.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman from Mississippi will allow me to interrupt him for a question. Will he state to the House what has been the custom in cases where the executive officer, when called upon for information, replies that the information can not be furnished in his judgment without prejudice to the Government? Has it been the custom of the House to insist under such circumstances that the information should be furnished.

Mr. MONEY. In reply to the gentleman I will say I am not familiar with the precedents, for I have not investigated that matter; but I am giving reasons why the House in this particular case should insist upon the information being furnished.

Mr. REED. Has there ever been an instance where the House has done this?

Mr. MONEY. I can not answer that question, because I have not examined the precedents.

Mr. REED. I remember none.

Mr. MONEY. That may be, and still there may be such cases. The gentleman can not remember what he never knew.

Mr. CALKINS. One more question, and I put it only for the purpose of getting this matter squarely before the House. Suppose that the Postmaster-General should be of opinion that to publish the information which has been collected in reference to these star-route matters would put the defendants in possession in advance of the evidence which has been accumulated by the Government, and for that reason would be prejudicial to many cases which might be prosecuted, does the gentleman say that under circumstances like those it would be wise for the House to insist upon the Postmaster-General furnishing the information?

Mr. MONEY. That is exactly the matter to which I was addressing myself. I say there is no reason expressed in the reply of the Postmaster-General, nor is there any implied, except that the communication of this information might be—observe that he puts it in the subjunctive mood—might be detrimental to the success of suits which may be brought, not suits that are intended to be brought or are being brought.

Mr. CALKINS. Let me assure the gentleman that personally I have no opposition to the communication of this information.

Mr. MONEY. I was submitting to the House that as there has been no conviction upon the cases most favorable to the Government after an immense expenditure of money and time, with all the legal talent and other resources which the Department of Justice can command at pleasure, this House is not warranted in the conclusion that the public interest can suffer in any manner or degree by the production of these papers. If there is any latent reason, which is not brought to me and which I have no right to infer, why these papers should not be produced, that is a matter I can not inquire into.

Mr. CALKINS. Still I think the gentleman will agree with me that where the head of one of the Executive Departments of the Government, having been called upon for information, states in his communication to the House that in his judgment the information can not be communicated without prejudice to the public interest, such a statement ought to receive at our hands some consideration.

Mr. MONEY. I would not permit the gentleman from Indiana or any other man to go before me in proper deference to the Postmaster-General or any other officer at the head of any Department of the Government. I expect to treat all these officers with perfect courtesy in a matter of this kind. As the gentleman from Indiana and the House will observe, I am endeavoring to show that the only reason assigned by the Postmaster-General should have no weight or consideration, and I show it by the precedents upon the very matter in hand.

Mr. BEACH. If the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] will give way for one moment I would like to make a statement for the information of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS]. There were two resolutions offered having in view a similar object. The resolution which I submitted called for the production of reports of special agents which were made in 1881. There was another resolution which called for the reports of all the agents made subsequently to that time, and also for an itemized account of the moneys which had been expended by the Government in prosecuting the perpetrators of these frauds. Now, in answer to the resolution which I introduced the Postmaster-General referred to the answer he gave to the other resolution, that it would be incompatible with the public interest for him to furnish the papers called for by that other resolution. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this answer to the resolution I introduced is not ingenuous, because the reasons which might apply in the case of the other resolution, in favor of withholding the information, do not apply in the case of my resolution. I do not see how the production of the papers called for by my resolution could affect the public interest. They are the preliminary reports made away back in 1881, during the administration of Mr. James as Postmaster-General. Now, I think the gentleman from Mississippi, in urging the adoption of the present resolution, is on the right tack, and that we ought to have those papers.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] will allow me to say——

Mr. MONEY. I do not want my whole time consumed by these interruptions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CALKINS. I would like to put one more question to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MONEY. I want the House to proceed understandingly in this matter. It is not my intention that there shall be any snap judgment or anything of that sort. I desire that the House, in assuming this responsibility, shall fully understand the extent and effect of its action.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I rise to a point of order. This discussion can not proceed intelligently while there is so much confusion in the House.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order and gentlemen will take their seats. The House is proceeding in the consideration of a matter of some importance, and the Chair hopes that order will be preserved.

Mr. MONEY rose.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will suspend until order is restored.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that I perfectly acquit the Postmaster-General of anything like disingenuousness in his reply to the resolution of inquiry adopted by the House. The gentleman must see clearly that the Postmaster-General makes his formal objection to responding to the first resolution of inquiry, so as to make some action on our part necessary; and in his second letter the Postmaster-General again shows his willingness to throw the responsibility for furnishing these papers upon the House. Now, I say the papers are not the same, though it seems in his reply the papers called for are the same as provided for in the first resolution of inquiry. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads do not care anything for those other papers, as they are not interested in that discussion, but the committee does want the special reports of the special agents of the Post-Office Department, showing the working of the contract system on star routes. The Postmaster-General tells us he has all those matters in readiness for transmission to the House whenever the demand is made on him, and that he simply awaits the action of the House on the resolution of inquiry before he sends the papers here.

Mr. HORR. The Postmaster-General knows the contents of these papers now, does he not?

Mr. MONEY. What papers?

Mr. HORR. The papers we want him to send to the House.

Mr. MONEY. Of course.

Mr. HORR. Is he not better able, then, to tell us whether they should be divulged or not?

Mr. MONEY. I have already discussed the reasons he has advanced, but that does not throw a particle of light on the subject.

Mr. HORR. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The Postmaster-General does not give any reason.

Mr. MONEY. On the contrary, he does give a reason, and that is that it may hurt the Government in the prosecution under these star-route contracts.

Mr. HORR. Why not take his judgment of that, as he has better opportunities for knowing than we have?

Mr. MONEY. I have given the reasons why his judgment should not be taken more than once, and those reasons address themselves to the common sense of the House. I have no desire in the world to extract from the files of the Post-Office Department any information which in the least degree might be detrimental to the public service. This information, I undertake to say, will not in any degree be detrimental to the public interest. There is not a man to-day in this House or out of it, in the Post-Office Department or out of it, who believes one single dollar will ever be collected from those suits. I get that from gentlemen who are competent to judge.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Mississippi says the time for criminal cases has expired. I do not understand him to say the time for civil suits has expired.

Mr. MONEY. I said it had not.

Mr. REED. That it had not?

Mr. MONEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman not know as a matter of experience it is more difficult to procure conviction in criminal cases than in civil cases? And may it not be possible the situation of affairs is such that injury may be done to civil suits where there is reasonable ground for success? Now, the gentleman from Mississippi says we can judge of these reasons as well as the Postmaster-General, but unfortunately one element of knowledge the Postmaster-General has we do not have, namely, the contents of the reports which it is claimed should be communicated to us. That is the most important element for a correct judgment that the Postmaster-General has and the House has not. The Postmaster-General says that in all probability it will be injurious to the Government to furnish those reports. The gentleman from Mississippi says it will not. The Postmaster-General knows and the gentleman from Mississippi does not.

Mr. MONEY. If the gentleman from Maine will ask his question, I will be happy to oblige him with an answer.

Mr. REED. I am not asking a question; I am making a suggestion. I did not rise to ask a question.

Mr. MONEY. I understood the gentleman to rise to ask me a question.

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Speaker, I resume the floor. I know that the Postmaster-General has information that we can not get of course except through him. Now, I am examining simply the reason which is given by him for withholding that information. That reason is that the Government of the United States may suffer in the prosecution of these suits against parties implicated in these star-route frauds. It is my own experience and that of every other man, and certainly is a matter of public information, that there has been nothing done whatever in the line of recovery so far in reference to these star-route cases. No recoveries at all have been made, and the most favorable suits have already been urged by the Government. The reasons, therefore, which the Postmaster-General has given are not, I think, a sufficient warrant for a refusal on the part of the House to insist upon that information, and the judgment of the House will, I am satisfied, approve that position. There is no solid ground in my opinion for the assertion that the resolution should not pass and the House be placed in possession of this information which is regarded as essential.

This side of the House, Mr. Speaker, is just as much interested as the other side in the execution of the laws and in the prosecution of all persons connected with these star-route affairs. We feel just as lively an interest in the welfare of the Government and in its protection. We are just as much concerned in whatever is of interest to the Government and in the recovery under the law of all that can be recovered of these excessive payments; but we do not see any reason why the resolution should fail because of the facts alleged by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. WAIT. May I ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. WAIT. The gentleman from Mississippi has the reputation of being an able lawyer.

Mr. MONEY. No, sir; that is a mistake. I am no lawyer at all.

Mr. WAIT. I am happy to accord to the gentleman that reputation, as I believe he studied for the profession. Now let me ask the gentleman from Mississippi as a lawyer——

Mr. MONEY. I am not a lawyer; I am a farmer.

Mr. WAIT. Then, if not as a lawyer, as an intelligent gentleman, having his course of conduct governed by considerations of practical good sense and business judgment, if in the control of a specific case, whether as attorney or a party, he would deem it wise prior to the trial of such case to let the opposite party know his evidence, become acquainted with all the important facts that might control the decision of his case, and the names of his witnesses by whose testimony he expected to prove the same? Does he not think it would be in every respect wiser not to place himself in such a position, putting himself entirely in the power of his opponent?

Mr. MONEY. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. WAIT. I ask the gentleman if he would regard it wise or prudent in a case where he was interested as an attorney or as a party to let his opponent understand what his witnesses are going to say and thus permit him to prepare himself in that line of defense which will protect him from an adverse decision?

Mr. MONEY. In this case I do not think it will be a matter of practical difference. There will be no recovery whatever; the Government will not secure a dollar from these parties.

Mr. WAIT. But is it not an imperative duty which the members of this House owe to the country that they should give to the legal advisers of the Government all the legitimate chances for success in civil suits now pending or to be brought, which they may possess by fair trials, conducted by ordinary methods? I can not but believe that the result of the gentleman's resolution, if carried into effect, will be to protect a body of men who are charged with defrauding the public. It would surely defeat every chance that the Government would otherwise possess of a recovery against these men, charged with these acts, by putting them in possession of all the evidence which the Government holds and upon which its counsel rely for a successful and I think I may add just result.

Mr. MONEY. The Government has already had an opportunity to bring suits for the recovery of these claims and not a dollar has been recovered. I have no doubt that the strongest suits have been brought.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CANNON. I ask my friend from Mississippi to yield to me for ten minutes.

Mr. MONEY. I have been asked by other gentlemen to yield a portion of the time. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois five minutes, however.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will allow me a few moments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. I know that, and want to secure it with his consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Mississippi has yielded to the gentleman from Illinois on the left [Mr. CANNON] for five minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think the committees having charge of this subject might have a right to the floor to throw some light on the matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, am I not entitled to control the time on this side of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Mississippi has one hour. He has occupied but twenty minutes so far, and has now yielded five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a point of order. It is utterly impossible for members in this House to know what is being done in consequence of the confusion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aware of the fact and regrets it. The Chair has frequently called upon the House and requested gentlemen to resume their seats and cease conversation on the floor. That is all the Chair can do. The Chair will again appeal to gentlemen to preserve order and hopes it will be preserved while this matter is under consideration.

The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I will say, Mr. Speaker, if this discussion is to run so that my friend from Indiana [Mr. PEELLE] will be recognized I would like to have more than five minutes and will not consume the five minutes now yielded to me by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MONEY. Then I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia on the committee.

Mr. REESE. Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen who have made inquiries on the other side of the House with reference to this matter have a misconception of the purpose of this resolution as compared to the object of the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]. The resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois was in search of entirely different information from that sought by the resolution now under consideration. That resolution was for the purpose of eliciting from the Post-Office Department all correspondence touching the star-route cases that had occurred between the Attorney-General and the Postmaster-General, and also covering an itemized statement of expenditures connected therewith. The present resolution does not seek that class of information, and so far as the response of the Postmaster-General is concerned it will appear from these letters that accompany this report that the Postmaster-General expressly specified that this correspondence is all that would be incompatible with the public interests. In reply, as gentlemen will discover by reading that first letter in reply to the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, who was seeking, as I have said, all of the correspondence between the Postmaster-General and the Department of Justice, coupling with it an itemized statement of expenditures, the Postmaster-General says that it would be incompatible with the public interests to furnish that information; and that is all that he specified directly in his response to that resolution, that that information is all that would be incompatible.

The resolution now under consideration, which is the same resolution that was introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] on the 30th January, simply calls, not for the correspondence that the Postmaster-General says it would be incompatible with the public interest to submit——

Mr. BEACH. That is it.

Mr. REESE. But it simply asks for the report of special agents during the investigation of the star-route cases during the year 1881. Now, I say that in the response by the Postmaster-General to the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] he says in his letter of reply that this information is substantially the same information that was sought in the original resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]. Now that can not be so. It is not so. It is entirely different information. And therefore I say, as to the statement in his last letter, that this resolution is substantially the original resolution; it is not in fact at all like it; it does not seek the same information at all; it seeks information in relation to which he has never said and does not now say it would be incompatible with the public interest..

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield to me?

Mr. MONEY. On what side does the gentleman desire to speak?

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to represent the views on the subject of the committee of which I am chairman.

Mr. MONEY. How long time does the gentleman want?

Mr. SPRINGER. About five minutes.

Mr. MONEY. I think the gentleman had better get his time on the other side.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does the gentleman propose to occupy his whole hour?

Mr. MONEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. On which side does the gentleman from Illinois desire to speak?

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to speak for the committee which I represent, and which is opposed to the furnishing of this information.

Mr. MONEY. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. SPRINGER. Five or ten minutes.

Mr. MONEY. I yield the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this matter can be made so plain that we may all distinctly understand what the facts are, and differ, if we differ at all, upon the conclusions. On the 17th of January I reported from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be requested to furnish the House of Representatives with copies of all correspondence between the Department of Justice and the Post-Office Department touching the prosecution of persons charged with frauds in connection with the star-route mail service, and a statement of the names of individuals found to be indebted to the United States and the amount of the indebtedness of each in consequence of such frauds, and also an itemized statement of the expenditures in the Post-Office Department from the 4th day of March, 1881, to the 1st day of January, 1884, in the investigation and prosecution of such frauds.

That resolution was sent to the Postmaster-General. He did not furnish the information, but sent to the House of Representatives, through the Speaker, a letter which by the House was sent to the committee of which I am chairman. This letter I will read.

Mr. BEACH. It has been already read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I believe it is substantially the letter embraced in the report submitted by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY].

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. The one letter is an identical copy of the other.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, the question which has arisen is whether the information which the Postmaster-General is of opinion should be withheld is the same so far as each of these resolutions is concerned. There can be no doubt, Mr. Speaker, upon this subject. The Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice have instructed me to report back to this House a resolution which was introduced by me on Monday of last week in the following words:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General, in complying with the request of the House of Representatives contained in the resolutions of inquiry adopted on the 17th of January, and also of the resolution adopted on the 30th day of January, in reference to the correspondence between the Department of Justice and the Post-Office Department touching the prosecution of persons charged with frauds in connection with the star-route mail service, and the reports of special agents of the Post-Office Department relating thereto, is requested to withhold such parts of the papers called for the publication of which in advance of the commencement of suits may be and probably would be detrimental to public interests.

Mr. REESE. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. In one moment. The committee of which I am chairman has recommended unanimously the adoption of this resolution and has authorized me to report it. When I came into the House this morning from my committee-room the other report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads was pending. And I have asked this time from the courtesy of the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads for the purpose of explaining the whole question.

As regards the question raised by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. REESE], as to whether the information called for by these two resolutions is the same, I think I can convince the House in a moment it is precisely the same. The resolution which I introduced on the 17th of January called for—all correspondence between the Department of Justice and the Post-Office Department touching the prosecution of persons charged with frauds in connection with the star-route mail service, and a statement of the names of individuals found to be indebted to the United States and the amount of the indebtedness of each in consequence of such frauds.

Now, this was precisely the information that the special agents of the Department obtained and have reported in detail to the Postmaster-General, and which by the Postmaster-General, as was his duty, has been transmitted to the Attorney-General as the basis of the suits brought against individuals.

Mr. BEACH. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BEACH. How does the gentleman know that?

Mr. SPRINGER. I know it from the fact that gentlemen connected with the Post-Office Department who have charge of these prosecutions have so informed me. I took occasion to learn those facts.

Now, the information which these reports contained and which is called for by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads is contained in the reports of those agents who went over all the Western territory and took the evidence of witnesses living along the lines of these star routes; and that information is the basis of the calculation and the reports in the Post-Office Department which have been transmitted to the Attorney-General for his guidance in bringing suits against these individuals. I may state that the amount of these claims, as I have been informed, exceeds $2,000,000; that the Government believes it has good cases against persons who have heretofore been and who, some of them, now are contractors in the mail service for the purpose of recovering these large sums of money, and it is the opinion of the Postmaster-General, as stated in a communication to the House, that if he is required to furnish this information to the public the beneficiaries of those frauds will see to it that those witnesses are spirited away, and that the publication of those facts will embarrass, to say the least, if not defeat the Government in its efforts to secure the amounts which these persons are believed to be indebted to the United States.

Mr. REESE. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him to ask a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. REESE. Did the committee of which you are chairman ever have a letter in reply from the Postmaster-General to the resolution introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH]?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir.

Mr. REESE. Then how could you ever act upon the subject and determine that to make public this information would be detrimental to the interests of the Government?

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course we are obliged to take cognizance of all the facts and proceedings of the House; and in view of the fact that we were charged with an investigation looking to a prosecution of persons indebted to the Government we felt it to be our duty to inform ourselves of the opinion of the Department in reference to this subject.

Having stated these facts, I am perfectly willing that the House shall take the responsibility of calling for this information. It is my opinion, however, that the Government will be embarrassed if required to furnish it, and we might lose all that might otherwise be gained in the prosecution of persons indebted to the Government. The responsibility must be taken by the House as to whether we here shall assume the right to say that this information shall be made public, and whether the officers charged with making this investigation and these prosecutions are to be instructed by the House as to how they will conduct their cases, and what information in advance of the commencement of the suits shall be given to the public.

It is well known to gentlemen who have had experience as lawyers that in civil suits the plaintiff is not obliged to furnish the opposite party with the names of his witnesses and what his witnesses are expected to testify to in the case. So the Government in these civil suits is not obliged to furnish the defendant with the names of the witnesses of the Government, the places of their residence, and what those witnesses are expected to testify to in the trial. It might be different in some instances in criminal prosecutions, but in civil prosecutions the Government should have the advantage of all the information it has obtained, so as to enable it to succeed in the efforts being made to obtain the large sums of money of which the Government has been defrauded.

As to the question whether the Government will obtain judgment against these parties, I will say that I do not know whether it will or not. That is not the business of the House of Representatives. All we should do is to insist that the officers of the Government charged with such prosecutions shall do their duty. If we say to them that the people's Representatives expect them to do their duty, I hope they will not be able to retort upon us by saying that we have interfered with them in the discharge of their duty.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONEY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. SPRINGER. Allow me to say that at the proper time I propose to offer as a substitute for the pending proposition a resolution which the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman have instructed me to report.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I hope this resolution will pass calling for this information, no matter whether the heads of Departments suppose that its publication tends to the public good or not. Whence comes this monarchical assumption that two or three servants more or less at the heads of the different bureaus or Departments may refuse to the people's Representatives sitting here whatever information they may call for? I do not know where the idea comes from or how it got into the minds of officers of a republican government.

Why should this information be refused? The Constitution of the United States provides that the House may have secret sessions whenever it pleases. That provision was made so that if there was any matter which made public would not be compatible with the public good, the House of Representatives, the Representatives of the people, might be left to judge of that.

I hold that we have a right to ask for any information without that phrase which is foolishly put into every resolution of this kind, "if not incompatible with the public interest." I shall object to all resolutions so worded and shall vote against anything of that kind. We have a right to send for persons and papers. If these our servants who have information refuse to give it to us, then let the committee send for the Postmaster-General or the Secretary of State, for persons and papers and bring them here. If necessary we can go into secret session in order to ascertain what are the rights of the people in these matters.

We have the right to call for any information which we desire. It is a monarchical idea for a servant of the people to assume that he will withhold information from the Representatives of the people that may be important to them. We are to judge of that, and not the head of any Department.

Mr. KASSON. The President has the right under the Constitution to refuse any information when in his opinion it will be "incompatible with the public interest" to furnish it.

Mr. MONEY. The resolution which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] says he will offer at the proper time as a substitute for that now pending is something I can not understand. He says he is instructed by his committee to report such a resolution.

Now, it must occur to members of the House that such a resolution is entirely superfluous, because the Postmaster-General is already doing what the gentleman proposes to instruct him to do. Furthermore, the defeat of the resolution which I have presented will accomplish the very purpose which the adoption of his resolution will accomplish. It is entirely superfluous for him to present such a resolution as that. But I will say furthermore that I do not see how the gentleman came into possession of the letter of the Postmaster-General, which was referred by the House to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. SPRINGER. The same letter was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. I have it here and will show it to the gentleman.

Mr. MONEY. I will state again why I ask the adoption of this resolution. It is because the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads are considering a bill which regulates the letting and subletting of contracts upon star routes. Because of the great abuses in the administration of the Contract Bureau it has become necessary to amend the legislation upon this subject. The agents who have been sent where these routes are operated are in possession of information which they have transmitted by special reports to the Postmaster-General; and it is necessary for us in order to present to this House the legislation I have indicated to be in possession of that information.

I say further that neither the gentleman from Illinois nor any other man in this House believes that a dollar will ever be recovered in any of these suits. The prosecution of these suits for the last three years gives no warrant for expecting that there should be any recovery. There is no expectation of a recovery. There is no information that any suits are begun or intended to be begun. Not a particle of information has yet been transmitted to this House or given to the country through public report or rumor that such is the intention of the Department of Justice or the Post-Office Department.

This resolution asks for information which it is proper this House should have. If this information exposes any rascality, let it do so. We want the information in order to perfect the bill which we propose to present to the House, to be placed on the statute-books of the country.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Mississippi allow me two minutes?

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Speaker, as the gentlemen opposed to this resolution will have an hour in which to present their views, I beg leave to reserve the residue of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has twelve minutes remaining.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will give me two minutes. I am not going to speak in opposition to his resolution. I wish to answer the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. MONEY. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON].

Mr. KASSON. I do not rise to debate the resolution, but to answer the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON], in which he denies the right of the executive branch of the Government to exercise its discretion in responding to the inquiry of this House. It is so easy to mislead the House on such a question, that I wish to say in this immediate connection that the phrase "if not incompatible with the public interest" has been settled upon principle and upon due consideration of the respective rights of the two departments of the Government and from time almost immemorial. The executive department is as independent within its province under the Constitution as is the legislative branch of the Government; and certainly one-half of the legislative body can do nothing that can have the force of law over the executive department. This condition has been recognized from the time of Washington. Consequently this House, in addressing demands to the executive department through the President, has always and with great propriety used the phrase "if not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I hope it will never be used again.

Mr. KASSON. The only way in which we can control the executive department in this respect is the mode provided in the Constitution—by the passage of a constitutional law which binds all branches of the Government. But this House, as gentlemen upon a moment's reflection will see, ought never to assume that it alone has the right to control in any respect the action of the executive branch of the Government.

I have only interposed this remark that gentlemen may pause before accepting the statement that this House of Representatives, singly and alone, has the right to shape and direct the action of the executive in any degree whatever.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I would like to reply to the gentleman; but I will not ask for the time.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to put a question or two (to be answered in my time) to the gentleman from Mississippi my colleague on the committee and its chairman. Did the gentleman desire this House to understand or infer from anything he said that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads seeks or desires the information asked by this resolution in order to aid that committee in considering the bill with reference to the letting or subletting of the star-route service?

Mr. MONEY. Exactly; that is what I stated.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, this is the first time since this resolution was introduced that I have heard any reason given for the information sought for. I can not conceive of any possible good which will be derived from the information if it be obtained, and it may result disastrous to the Government in its prosecutions of contractors, &c.

It is true, as the gentleman from Iowa has stated, that this resolution (being a House resolution) is directed to the executive department of this Government, which may or may not give the information asked for. But, sir, I apprehend that the Postmaster-General, acting for the executive department, in view of the language of the resolution, would not feel at liberty to withhold the information sought for, and certainly would not withhold it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] my colleague on the committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, this whole proposition has resulted simply from an inquiry made by two committees of this House, one the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, the other the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. The first resolution covering this question was adopted in response to the recommendation of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 18:

STAR-ROUTE CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. SPRINGER, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, reported back the following resolution, with the recommendation that it do pass:

"Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be requested to furnish the House of Representatives with copies of all correspondence between the Department of Justice and the Post-Office Department touching the prosecution of persons charged with frauds in connection with the star-route mail service, and a statement of the names of individuals found to be indebted to the United States and the amount of the indebtedness of each in consequence of such frauds, and also an itemized statement of the expenditures in the Post-Office Department from the 4th day of March, 1881, to the 1st day of January, 1884, in the investigation and prosecution of such frauds."

Mr. CALKINS. Of course I have no objection to the resolution except that there is a committee for the investigation of expenditures in the Post-Office Department, and it would seem that the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice are calling for expenditures in the Post-Office Department in connection, as I understand the resolution, with that committee. I suggest whether it does not trench on the ground of another committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will state to the gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. CALKINS. I have no objection to it myself, but only call the attention of the House to it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will state in explanation that it is the duty of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice to examine into the accounts and expenditures of that Department, and also as to the enforcement of the payment of moneys due to the United States, and this resolution relates to that branch of the public service which is required to be looked into, that is, the enforcement of payment of amounts due to the United States. It therefore is a subject properly coming under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Seven days after the resolution just read the Postmaster-General sent to this House this information in official letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 25, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 17th instant, requesting copies of all the correspondence between this Department and the Department of Justice touching the prosecution of persons charged with frauds in connection with the star-route mail service; a statement of individuals found to be so indebted to the United States and the amount of the indebtedness of each in consequence of such frauds, and also an itemized statement of expenditures in the Post-Office Department from March 4, 1881, to January 1, 1884, in the investigation and prosecution of such frauds. The itemized statement of expenditures is now being prepared and will be transmitted as early as possible. I addressed a communication to the Attorney-General showing the names of individuals found to be indebted to the United States, with the names and residences of witnesses who will be able to testify in behalf of the Government, and I deem it proper Congress shall know that the publication of this latter in advance of the commencement of suits might and probably would be detrimental to the public interests. If, however, Congress shall think otherwise, the desired information will be furnished without delay.

Very respectfully,

W. Q. GRESHAM,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

This letter of January 25 came to the House, and was properly referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

On January 31 the RECORD shows that a resolution of inquiry, offered January 17 by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH], calling for information, and especially the reports of the special agents of the Post-Office Department for the year 1881, was reported back by Mr. ROGERS. I read from the RECORD of that date:

STAR-ROUTE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I am directed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report back a substitute for the resolution of Mr. BEACH, of New York, referred to that committee on the 17th instant, and recommend its passage.

The SPEAKER. The original resolution will be read, after which the proposed substitute of the committee will be reported to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he hereby is, requested to transmit to this House all reports, papers of every kind and nature whatever referring to the star-route investigation, made by special agents of the Post-Office Department to the Postmaster-General during the year 1881."

The committee recommend the adoption of the following substitute:

"Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and is hereby, directed to transmit to this House all reports made by special agents of the Post-Office Department to the Postmaster-General during the year 1881 having reference to the star-route investigation and which have not heretofore been published and made public."

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I ask that the resolution be put upon its passage.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The letter of the Postmaster-General to the House in reply to the resolution of inquiry ordered by the House, on the request of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, January 18, it must be remembered, had not at this time been read to the House, but was in the possession of the Springer committee. The Postmaster-General, on receipt of the resolution from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, makes this response:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 1, 1884.

SIR: The resolution of the 30th ultimo, directing that the reports made by special agents during the year 1881, having reference to the star-route investigation, be transmitted to the House of Representatives, has been received.

Having no information of the views of the House on the suggestion submitted in my communication of the 25th ultimo in reference to the resolution therein referred to, and as the resolution to which I am now required to respond substantially covers the same subjects and calls for the same information as the former resolution, I deem it a proper courtesy to the House and in just consideration for the public interest to await the further action of your honorable body before transmitting the papers called for. I beg leave to state that I have directed that the papers should be in readiness, in order that there may be no delay in forwarding them should the House, upon further consideration of the subject and in view of my letter of the 25th ultimo, deem it expedient and proper that they should be submitted to the public inspection.

Very respectfully,

W. Q. GRESHAM,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. J. G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

This letter was properly referred to the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads. On February 7 the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice offered a resolution modifying the resolution of his committee under date of January 17, because of the statement contained in the letter of the Postmaster-General addressed to the House, in these words:

I addressed a communication to the Attorney-General showing the names of individuals found to be indebted to the United States, with the names and residences of witnesses who will be able to testify in behalf of the Government, and I deem it proper Congress shall know that the publication of this letter in advance of the commencement of suits might and probably would be detrimental to the public interests.

The members of the committee wisely determined that so serious a responsibility should not rest upon them.

I read from the RECORD of February 8 the action of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, after duly considering the letter of the Postmaster-General of January 25:

STAR-ROUTE FRAUDS.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw for a moment the call for the regular order that I may ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I hold in my hand. When the gentleman hears the resolution read I am sure he will withdraw the demand for the regular order.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Let the resolution be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. It modifies a resolution of inquiry heretofore addressed to the Postmaster-General.

The resolution was read, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Postmaster-General, in complying with the request of the House of Representatives contained in the resolution of inquiry adopted on the 17th of January, and also the resolution adopted on the 30th of January, in reference to the correspondence between the Department of Justice and the Post-Office Department touching the prosecution of persons charged with frauds in connection with the star-route mail service, and the reports of special agents of the Post-Office Department relating thereto, is requested to withhold such parts of the papers called for the publication of which in advance of the commencement of suits may be and probably would be detrimental to the public interests."

The SPEAKER. Is the demand for the regular order withdrawn?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. It is.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection to the present consideration of the resolution, the question is on its adoption.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman withhold his objection to allow me to give an explanation?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I withhold the objection for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will be recognized to make a statement, the right to object to the consideration of the resolution being reserved.

Mr. SPRINGER. This resolution is accompanied by a report from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. That report is on the Speaker's table, and is made in reference to a letter sent to this House and referred by the House to that committee, in which the Postmaster-General advises the House that it would be against the public interest to publish certain parts of this correspondence and information. With a view to respond to the suggestion of the Postmaster-General, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice have instructed me to report this resolution.

The resolution simply asks the Postmaster-General to withhold such parts of that information as would, if published, be detrimental to the interests of the Government. There are numerous cases in the Post-Office Department in reference to the amounts that may be recovered of individuals for overcharges in the postal service. Those cases contain briefs of the names of witnesses, what they will testify, and where they reside. It was thought by the Postmaster-General that if this information was given to the public it would greatly embarrass the officers of the Government in their endeavors to recover the amounts which the Government expects to recover in those cases.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. As I understand the gentleman, if these facts are published it will simply advise parties and witnesses what is to be apprehended, and will give them an opportunity of getting out of the way of the process of the court.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is the statement of the Postmaster-General, and in view of that fact the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice have recommended the adoption of the resolution which has been read. I hope the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] will withdraw his objection.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I regret that I can not withdraw my objection. I have had sufficient conference this morning with the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads [Mr. MONEY], which committee reported this resolution to the House through me, to know that if he were present he would antagonize this resolution for reasons entirely satisfactory to himself. For that reason I can not, in his absence, consent to the introduction of this resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman consent to have the resolution introduced and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I can not consent to that, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the resolution is not before the House.

The gentleman from Arkansas simply by his right to object, without specifying a reason, prevented the consideration of the gentleman's resolution.

The objection of the gentleman from Arkansas carried the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] over until February 11, when he offered it. I read from the RECORD of the 12th of February:

STAR-ROUTE FRAUDS.

Mr. SPRINGER also submitted the following resolution of inquiry; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice:

"Resolved, That the Postmaster-General, in complying with the request of the House of Representatives contained in the resolutions of inquiry adopted on the 17th of January, and also of the resolution adopted on the 30th day of January, in reference to the correspondence between the Department of Justice and the Post-Office Department touching the prosecution of persons charged with frauds in connection with the star-route mail service and the reports of special agents of the Post-Office Department relating thereto, is requested to withhold certain such parts of the papers called for the publication of which in advance of the commencement of suits may be and probably would be detrimental to public interests."

I have given to the House the complete history of these two resolutions asking for the same information, and which have justified the Postmaster-General in writing two letters informing the House that the records and reports asked for "might and probably would be detrimental to the public interests if published."

Mark, Mr. Speaker, to what extent the official declaration made by the Postmaster-General upon a knowledge of the contents of the records has impressed itself upon the two committees. The Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice has unanimously resolved in reporting the resolution back to the House that the Postmaster-General be requested to withhold certain and such parts of the papers called for the publication of which in advance of the commencement of suits may be and probably would be detrimental to the public interest.

What effect has the statement of the Postmaster-General had upon the action of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads? One should naturally suppose the same as upon the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. Not so, however. I believe I make no unparliamentary utterance when I submit that the resolution reported to-day by the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads comes into the House by simply one majority. It was considered upon two distinct occasions and two votes were taken, and each resulted in but one majority. Let me ask, Is the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads at this time, either by its own action or by reference of this House, considering any question relating to the recent star-route trials, investigations, or the expenditure of public money in connection therewith? I know something of the business of the committee, and I am sure it is not. The House is not looking to the Post-Office Committee for information upon this subject, but, on the other hand, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice has this star-route-trial investigation and expenditures of public money directly under it, and the House and the country know they are entering into a thorough, complete, and searching investigation, with permission to sit during the session of the House.

That committee says to the House, "We will not take the responsibility of asking for the information and records that the Postmaster-General says 'if published might and would be detrimental to the public service.'" The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads comes back to the House and through its chairman to-day asks for the important records, without to my mind giving one good reason for their use when the committee may receive them.

The resolution under which this information has been asked did not originate with the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. It came from the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] January 17 and was referred to the committee. I am like the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PEELLE]. I have never known the reason for or the results to be accomplished by the use of this information until a few moments since, when the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads announced it to the House in these words:

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads is now considering a bill to regulate the carrying of mails on star routes. It is important that the information secured by special agents be before it, that the Government may be benefited by the proposed legislation.

I challenge this statement of the honorable chairman that the information is needed or required in the consideration of the bill now before the committee, covering the question as specified in the gentleman's bill "to regulate the letting of mail contracts."

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] for purposes of his own, which I have no right and do not mean to impugn or inquire into, submitted the resolution to this House on January 17. After it had been before the committee twice it is reported back, but in no discussion before the committee was the question "to regulate the letting of mail contracts" ever submitted to the consideration or examination of the committee. Remember, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] introduced his resolution on the 17th of January last. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads had reported it back to this House with a favorable recommendation, notwithstanding the statement of the Postmaster-General, before the bill the gentleman refers to ever was before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. The gentleman never introduced his bill, a copy of which I hold in my hand, until February 4, 1884; and in this report to-day we find that for the first time this information asked for last January by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] is necessary for the consideration of this bill introduced on February 4 by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY].

I am familiar with the gentleman's bill of February 4, and he well knows that all the information necessary to a complete and full discussion of its several propositions can be obtained at the Department without asking for records, which, if "published, might be detrimental to the public interest."

Why does the resolution call only for reports of special agents for 1881? Why does not the gentleman chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads want those for 1880, or 1882, or 1883, or 1879? Why does he ask only for those of 1881, and when the Postmaster-General tells you "it would be detrimental to the public service" to give that information?

Why is that particular information necessary for the consideration of the bill introduced by the gentleman on February 4, 1884?

Would not the special agents' reports for some other year give the gentleman from Mississippi the required information for an intelligent examination of the proposed legislation? Must he have these important records for 1881—these and none other? I can understand that Mr. BEACH, the gentleman from New York, wants the reports for 1881, because he specially in his resolution asks for them; but as the committee simply desires to gain information for the consideration of a bill before it, I can not understand why information can not be asked from the Department that will not be detrimental if published to the public interests. I am of opinion that if the gentleman from New York had asked for the report of special agents for any other year than 1881 the committee would have thought that was the information it wanted.

Mr. REESE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. REESE. Do not you know it to be true that that reason was given when this resolution was last considered by the committee?

Mr. BINGHAM. What reason?

Mr. REESE. That it might be important to get this report and that it would disclose something to aid the committee in its labors.

Mr. BINGHAM. That might be said of any other subject whatever. The gentleman may say that anything he chooses would be important, but that is not the question here.

Mr. REESE. Was not that the reason given?

Mr. BINGHAM. The bill never had been read to the committee at that time. We never knew the bill——

Mr. REESE. My question is whether in the committee-room at the time this resolution was agreed upon by the committee, if that reason was not given among others?

Mr. BINGHAM. Undoubtedly, that it might be necessary in the consideration of some bill covering that question. But that reason might be given with reference to any bill, and my question is, why, if that was the operative or governing reason with the committee, do you want the special agents' report for 1881 and for no other year?

Mr. MONEY. Does the gentleman want an answer to that question?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do.

Mr. MONEY. Then I will answer it with the consent of the gentleman from Georgia. It is because they were sent to investigate the very abuses so long demanding the public attention, and because they contained all the information concerning the question.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman from Mississippi did not know what they contained. The only information the committee had upon the subject is the information of the Postmaster-General himself that they contained information if published that might and probably would be detrimental to the public service.

Mr. MONEY. I suppose when a special agent is sent to investigate a matter that his report covers the whole ground.

Mr. BINGHAM. But, Mr. Speaker, the important fact in connection with this matter is that two committees of this House have asked the Postmaster-General for the same information. One of these committees has withdrawn its request, and the other committee, a committee not investigating into the star-route frauds, demands that this House shall insist upon obtaining from the Department this valuable information, and the only reason which is suggested by the chairman of the committee is that that information may be useful in the consideration of a bill which was never introduced until long after the special agents' reports for 1881 were called for by the gentleman from New York.

I trust this House will not ask an Executive Department of this Government for information which, we are informed by the officer in charge of it and acting with a wise discretion, in fact the only party knowing the contents of these original and valuable special reports, if published might and probably would be detrimental to the public service.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, in the conflict between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, after having heard their statements, of course I must use my own judgment. If I understand the gentleman from Mississippi, he claims that this information is necessary to enable his committee to properly consider certain legislation touching the star-route service. If I understand my colleague from Illinois, he claims that this information should not be given because it would give notice to certain parties whom he apprehends have defrauded the Government of the facts and the names of the witnesses that might enable them to thwart the Government in its efforts to recover moneys from them fraudulently obtained.

Now, as to the position of the gentleman from Mississippi, I wish to say to him, after some considerable investigation in former years touching the star-route service and the law covering it, that long since I came to the conclusion that an economical star-route service lay more in the administration and the sound, economical discretion on the part of the Postmaster-General and his subordinates than it does in the provisions of the law. For instance, for the year ending June 30, 1880—I read from the Postmaster-General's report—the star-route service cost $7,321,000, while in 1883, closing the 30th of last June, the star-route service cost $4,739,000, and there was more service by 1,927,000 miles in 1883 than there was in 1880, and yet the service cost $2,582,000 less than it did in 1880.

Now, I submit that this star-route service, under the wise and economical administration of the present Postmaster-General and his Second Assistant, is getting along satisfactorily. I apprehend, then, if the gentleman from Mississippi is not able to formulate and pass any legislation whatever at this session of Congress, that we will continue to have a praiseworthy, effective, and economical star-route service for the next year to come. I apprehend further, in view of the statements of my colleague from Illinois and his committee, that great harm may result to the Government if this information which the Department now holds was made public at this time. Therefore I say that I shall vote, if I get the opportunity, for the substitute of my colleague from Illinois rather than for the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. I think now about all has been said on this resolution that need be said.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me to move a substitute?

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], who desires to offer a substitute.

The SPEAKER. For how long?

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. For five minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I offer what I send to the desk as a substitute for the resolution reported by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. MONEY. I make the point of order that the gentleman can not offer a resolution now pending before the House as a substitute for the resolution reported by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the proposed substitute of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General, in complying with the request of the House of Representatives contained in the resolutions of inquiry adopted on the 17th of January, and also of the resolution adopted on the 30th day of January, in reference to the correspondence between the Department of Justice and the Post-Office Department touching the prosecution of persons charged with frauds in connection with the star-route mail service, and the reports of special agents of the Post-Office Department relating thereto, is requested to withhold such parts of the papers called for the publication of which in advance of the commencement of suits may be and probably would be detrimental to public interests.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi desire to make a point of order upon the proposed substitute?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Mississippi to make the point of order that this is in substance the same if not identical with the resolution now pending, heretofore offered in the House and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. That is a question of fact which the Chair can only ascertain by inspection of the paper. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] can state what is the fact.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will state this is precisely the text of the resolution which I introduced in the call of States on Monday a week ago and which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. I will state further that that committee has authorized me to report this resolution back with a recommendation that it do pass. That is the state of the facts. I have not had the opportunity of making such report up to this time and have not so reported. The resolution which I have offered as a substitute is the text of a resolution which has been referred and has not yet been reported to the House. I offer it now as an independent proposition.

The SPEAKER. Is it in substance the same?

Mr. SPRINGER. It is. But the Chair will observe the rule provides it is not in order to move as an amendment a bill that is pending; but if my recollection be correct there is nothing in the rule as to a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

Mr. REESE. Does the gentleman from Illinois offer this as a substitute on his own individual motion or as chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice?

Mr. SPRINGER. I offer it on my own responsibility now because I have not the floor to report it from the committee. As the matter is also in charge of another committee, I think the House had better settle the whole matter at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read clause 4 of Rule XXI.

The Clerk read as follows:

No bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith the substance of any other bill or resolution pending before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will see——

Mr. SPRINGER. I see the point of order is well taken, and will withdraw what I proposed to offer as a substitute; but I will state to the House after there has been a vote on this proposition, if it be voted down, I will immediately ask the floor to make a report from the committee of which I am chairman and will report that resolution back.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], understanding that he desires now to close the debate.

Mr. BEACH. I rise to a question of privilege. I was absent from the House a few moments during the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] and on my return I was told by a member on this side of the House that he had in his remarks impugned my motives in the introduction of this resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania said just the reverse? I said I did not impugn the motives or the purposes of the gentleman. I only mentioned the gentleman's name with reference to the introduction of the resolution—nothing else.

Mr. MONEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I have very little to say on this subject. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, and the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that it is with very great diffidence that I would call in question any view that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] on this floor might express with reference to the Constitution. I am not quite sure that I caught the language of the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, and wish I had it before me now. But what I understood him to say was that the right of the President of the United States to refuse information to the House of Representatives when called for by them springs out of some provision of the Constitution.

Mr. KASSON. Not exactly that.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Will the gentleman be good enough to state it again?

Mr. KASSON. What I said was that under the Constitution of the United States the three branches of the Government had each an independent jurisdiction of its own; that one branch of the legislative body alone had no authority by its action to control the action of the executive branch of the Government or of the judicial branch of the Government; and that therefore it had been the uniform practice to recognize the right of the executive to exercise its own discretion when asked by the House for information, and to decline it, if necessary, on the ground of the public interest. Hence the introduction into our resolutions of the phrase "if not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I think I understand the gentleman from Iowa now, and I shall not antagonize that principle—that is, so far as he has gone. What I was about to say is this, that my understanding of the history of the origin of this matter of introducing into resolutions the words "if not incompatible with the public interest" is that it grew out of the foreign relations of the Government. Now, Mr. Speaker, it does not follow, it is not a sequitur, because the President of the United States or because the executive branch of the Government is an independent branch of the Government, that when Congress makes a polite request, when it repeats a request it has already made, or when it asks the President for information it believes to be of interest to the Government—it does not follow because he has the right to refuse giving the information that he will undertake to exercise that right.

Mr. KASSON. Not "Congress," but the House of Representatives, a part of Congress.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. The House of Representatives. I say it does not follow that when the House of Representatives calls for information which it believes should be given the Executive will undertake to exercise that right.

Having said that much, perhaps it was the duty of the executive branch of the Government, if it believed that the publication of this information would be incompatible with the good of the public service, to so inform the House. On the other hand, it is the duty of the House, if we believe that this information should be given us, to still insist upon his complying with the resolution which we have adopted. And let him refuse, if he thinks proper.

In this connection I have only to state in a different form one or two other propositions which have already been put by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. In the first place, all can see that nothing has resulted from the star-route prosecutions except the exposure of some of the men engaged in the illegal transactions. Every other result has been but a detriment to the Government, costing it nearly a half a million of dollars and a national scandal. Nobody has been punished, and nothing accomplished except exposure.

I say that gentlemen upon the other side of the House representing the party having control of the executive branch of the Government, as well as the Postmaster-General, and certainly the Attorney-General, ought to thank us if we take from them this shirt of Nessus—if we relieve them from any further responsibility on this subject.

The country will congratulate us, I am sure, for it is sick already of the star-route business and has no faith in the prosecutions.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is better, wiser, safer for the country that Congress avail itself of all possible information on that subject and mature such legislation as will tend to prevent a repetition of the star-route frauds, such legislation as will stop any further jobbery, even if it results in stopping civil prosecutions, which the history of the star-route business does not encourage us in believing will ever result in the recovery of one dollar; exposure will be the only satisfaction ever realized. I for one say now that I am willing to assume my share of the responsibility attaching to the passage of this resolution.

Mr. MONEY. I now yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON. One minute will be too much. I shall not trespass upon the courtesy of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] further than to say that this idea which we have got into is not a republican but a monarchical idea; and no matter how hoary and antiquated it may be, it should be stamped out of our proceedings. I should be happy at any time, if an opportunity should be given me, to discuss the matter with my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON].

Mr. KASSON. And I should be happy to refer the gentleman to some patriots of great distinction in connection with the question of Jay's treaty, in the time of President Washington, referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] this morning.

Mr. MONEY. It is not my desire in any manner to coerce the executive branch of this Government, and I do not think we have the power. But I simply desire to insist upon the production of these papers, because the Postmaster-General intimates that he will produce them upon the second call. He says that he has them in readiness, so that there may be no delay in their transmission to the House should a second demand be made.

It is not a question of antagonism between the executive and legislative branches of the Government, as stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON]. It is simply that the House in its discretion insists upon the production of these papers, not believing the reason given for withholding them to be sufficient.

No gentleman need think that because we ask for these papers we intend to publish them in the newspapers of the land. This information is asked for the use of the committee. I insist that the committee having charge of this subject is perfectly competent to take care of any papers that may be furnished them and to withhold from the public any information the publication of which might be detrimental to the interest of the Government. We are as much concerned for the public interest as any member of this House or as any officer of the executive department.

Mr. HARDEMAN. May I interrupt the gentleman for a question?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I understand that the information called for is from the Postmaster-General.

Mr. MONEY. That is so.

Mr. HARDEMAN. And relates to the star routes.

Mr. MONEY. Yes; reports of the special agents on the star routes.

Mr. HARDEMAN. Then I would like to know what authority any other committee has to interfere with the matter.

Mr. MONEY. That is more a question of propriety than anything else; they are their own judges of what they think to be proper. It is unnecessary for me to say anything more on this subject, and I therefore demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution reported from the committee.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. To avoid the consumption of time, I will call for the yeas and nays in the first instance.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 66 in the affirmative—more than one-fifth.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 148, nays 106, not voting 66; as follows:

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, with Mr. ATKINSON, on this question.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. MONEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to make a privileged report. It is a report authorized by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice upon the same subject as the resolution just adopted. As the House has acted on the question, I ask merely that the report be printed and lie upon the table.

The Clerk read the following resolution, reported by the committee with a favorable recommendation:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General, in complying with the request of the House of Representatives contained in the resolutions of inquiry adopted on the 17th of January, and also of the resolution adopted on the 30th day of January, in reference to the correspondence between the Department of Justice and the Post-Office Department touching the prosecution of persons charged with frauds in connection with the star-route mail service, and the reports of special agents of the Post-Office Department relating thereto, is requested to withhold such parts of the papers called for the publication of which in advance of the commencement of suits may be and probably would be detrimental to public interests.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, this report will be printed and lie upon the table.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to present a resolution for the printing of evidence taken by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. A number of persons who are affected by the evidence in some way desire to examine it, and the investigation is delayed very much by reason of the evidence not being in print.

The SPEAKER. Is the demand for the regular order insisted upon?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports. But before proceeding with that business, the Chair, if there be no objection, will present several executive communications.

There was no objection.

MANUFACTURE OF HEAVY ORDNANCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith the report of a board of Army and Navy officers appointed by me in accordance with the act of Congress approved March 3, 1883, "for the purpose of examining and reporting to Congress which of the navy-yards or arsenals owned by the Government has the best location and is best adapted for the establishment of a Government foundery, or what other method, if any, should be adopted for the manufacture of heavy ordnance adapted to modern warfare for the use of the Army and Navy of the United States, the cost of all buildings, tools, and implements necessary to be used in the manufacture thereof, including the cost of a steam-hammer or apparatus of sufficient size for the manufacture of the heaviest guns.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 18, 1884.

WAGES IN MANUFACTURING INDUSTRIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Superintendent of the Census, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House, a report of J. D. Weeks, special agent on wages in manufacturing industries, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Labor, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CANDLER, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. DIBRELL, for to-day, on account of illness.

To Mr. ATKINSON, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BURLEIGH, for four days, on account of inportant business.

To Mr. SUMNER, of California, until Monday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. CONNOLLY, until Monday next, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. BELFORD, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files, for reference to the Committee on Claims, all papers in relation to the claim of Albert G. Boone, there having been no adverse report.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for, and the committees will now be called for reports.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

Mr. TUCKER and Mr. BAYNE. I hope not.

The SPEAKER. The noes have it.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 56.

So the motion was disagreed to, and the morning hour was not dispensed with.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 1577, a bill (H. SOUTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BROADHEAD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 1808) to detach certain counties from the United States judicial district of California and create the United States judicial district of Southern California; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MERCHANTS' NATIONAL BANK, NEBRASKA CITY.

Mr. BUCKNER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4150) to change the name of the James Sweet National Bank of Nebraska City, Nebr., to that of the Merchants' National Bank of Nebraska City; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHICAGO COMMERCIAL NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back favorably the bill (H. ERIE HOME FOR INDIGENT SOLDIERS.

Mr. BAYNE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 1416) to authorize the Government of the United States to receive certain lands and property in the city of Erie, Pa., and to establish a home for indigent soldiers and sailors; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. SLOCUM, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to submit the views of the minority; which were ordered to be printed with the majority report.

SOCORRO GRANT.

Mr. COSGROVE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 1708, the bill (H. Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I desire to ask whether, after this matter is disposed of, the Committee on Appropriations will then give way, that the bill now pending from the Committee on Agriculture may be taken up and completed.

Mr. RYAN. I understand that it is the purpose of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] to bring forward an appropriation bill for consideration as soon as this matter is disposed of.

Mr. KEIFER. I hope to be able to bring up the Military Academy appropriation bill and dispose of it to-day.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I hope the gentleman will not press that bill to-day, but let us proceed with and finish the bill which has been already under consideration by special order of the House. The Committee on Appropriations already has one bill pending in Committee of the Whole. It has been hung up after debate of an hour or so.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri object to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. No; I do not desire to object.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 51) authorizing an expenditure of money for Indian educational purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized to expend so much of the sum of $150,000 appropriated for the purpose of further instructing and civilizing Indian children dwelling west of the Mississippi River, &c., in an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes," approved May 17, 1882 (22 Statutes, page 86), as he may deem necessary, for the purpose of erecting, furnishing, and repairing such school buildings as are now in course of construction or for which contracts have been made.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN], chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, consents to that disposition of the message.

Mr. CURTIN. It has been ordered to be printed already.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KEIFER. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BLAND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. KEIFER. I move by unanimous consent that bill be informally laid aside for the present, as the gentleman having charge of it does not wish to go on with it to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be informally laid aside for the present.

Mr. KEIFER. I now move that the committee take up for consideration at this time the bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KEIFER. I move by unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to discuss this bill in general debate. If there be any of the provisions of the bill which need explanation, that can be done under the five-minute rule. Of course if there are any gentlemen on the Committee on Appropriations who desire to debate it, I am not here to attempt to cut off that debate.

There is no new legislation, I may say to the committee, provided for in this bill.

The bill makes appropriation adequate to the general conduct and management of the Military Academy. The appropriations provided for are not as large as those of last year by $11,659. They do not reach the estimate submitted by $5,371.

The Committee on Appropriations have added $10,000 more for pay of cadets at the academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, than for the present fiscal year. In the opinion of the committee there will be more cadets at the academy during the coming fiscal year than during the present one in consequence of the increased number growing out of the fact that the present House has been increased. Some of the new members did not get cadets to the Military Academy for the present fiscal year.

Although under the statute one cadet is allowed to each Congressional district, the academy is not full. The total number provided by law at the Military Academy is three hundred and forty-four—one for each Congressional district, one for each Territory, one for the District of Columbia, and ten appointed by the President at large, making, as I have said, the total number three hundred and forty-four. There are now at the academy two hundred and seventy-nine. The bill provides for three hundred and fourteen—thirty less than the possible number, nearly one-tenth less than there may possibly be at the institution. This difference is because it is certain there will be vacancies in appointments by members of Congress and in the appointments made by the President by death or resignation.

Now I yield for a question to the gentleman on my right [Mr. BELFORD].

Mr. BELFORD. I wish to inquire of my friend from Ohio whether it is not a fact that the number of cadets has been increased by virtue of the increased number of members of this House under the last apportionment, and if the appropriations are not being diminished?

Mr. KEIFER. That is not a fact, taking the whole scope of the question. The number of cadets at West Point is increased, of course, by the increased membership of this House.

Mr. BELFORD. But is it not also a fact that you are diminishing the appropriations?

Mr. KEIFER. I am trying to answer the question of the gentleman, if he will permit me. I have stated that there is an increase of the appropriation for the pay of the cadets for the fiscal year that this bill provides for over the present fiscal year, and that the amount of the increase is $10,000. There is no proposition to reduce the number of the cadets, and it is the purpose of the committee to appropriate just as much as is necessary for the cadets that may be there.

Mr. COBB. How many cadets are now in the institution?

Mr. KEIFER. Two hundred and seventy-nine are reported by the Adjutant-General of the Army.

Mr. COBB. We are entitled, then, to about three hundred and forty?

Mr. KEIFER. Three hundred and forty-four is the number, and the bill provides for the pay of three hundred and fourteen. If we do not reach that number, of course the money will not be used.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman allow me another question? Can he give any reason why it is that the number of cadets is so much smaller than the number fixed by the law?

Mr. KEIFER. I can give this general reason: that quite a number who are sent there from the different Congressional districts fail in the primary examination, and there is no time to appoint others within the period fixed by the law; others fail and are dismissed from the institution during the year; and in various ways the number is reduced.

Mr. COBB. Let me ask the gentleman if he has examined into the standard fixed by the board of examination, and whether or not it is not so high that no young man can enter the institution who has not had opportunities of a very high grade of education?

Mr. KEIFER. I can only say——

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BELFORD. I intend to hear what is going on in this House or prove myself an obstructionist to the business here. If I can not hear what gentlemen are saying on the other side of the House I propose to stop business until I can hear. I have not been fortunate enough to get a front seat. I have not heard a word the gentleman from Indiana has said, and I propose to hear what is being done so that I can act understandingly or else I will stop all business.

Mr. COBB. I am like the gentleman from Colorado; I can scarcely hear myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is endeavoring to preserve order on the floor.

Mr. KEIFER. I will try to make gentlemen hear my answer. The gentleman from Indiana desires to know whether I have examined into the standard of examination fixed for the admission of cadets. I can say that I have not carefully done so. I have not fully examined it in detail, but I believe it to be a high standard. I have an impression that it is a very severe examination and one that is perhaps hardly necessary. The standard of education required for the admission of cadets to that institution may be too high. But still, Mr. Chairman, that is not a matter with which the Committee on Appropriations has had to deal. We have not felt called upon to deal with it, and hence I can not say whether it is too high or not. But I wish to say, however, in answer to the inquiries of gentlemen, that a great many of these cadets fail, after they have been admitted and passed the ordeal of the preliminary examination, for various reasons, physical sometimes as well as mental.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question.

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Would a high standard of admission, in the opinion of the gentleman from Ohio, be likely to increase or diminish the number of persons who were afterward found deficient?

Mr. KEIFER. I will yield to the gentleman from California himself time enough to answer his own question if he will. He is competent to answer it himself, having been once a professor at that institution.

Mr. ROSECRANS. My impression is that the standard of admission is not the cause of the deficiency of numbers to which the gentleman has been alluding. I believe from what I know of the Military Academy in this respect that no matter what standard you may fix, under any standard there will of necessity always be men found to be deficient and leave the academy during the year; so that the number of persons at West Point will never be equal to the number fixed by the law for any great length of time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will the gentleman from California allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KEIFER. I did not yield the floor except to the gentleman from California for a question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I only wish to ask a question of the gentleman from California in this connection.

Mr. KEIFER. Very well.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I know that the gentleman has had great experience in that institution as well as in other matters. Now, I wish to ask if the failures at the January examination, for instance, the January biennial examination, do not result from the fact that the period of time between these examinations is not long enough; that they crowd together in that institution studies in four years which, under ordinary circumstances and with the most of students, would require a period of at least six years to master them? I ask him whether that is not the reason why even those who are admitted on a primary examination sometimes fail?

Mr. ROSECRANS. If you give young men more time to acquire that kind of knowledge which is required between their admission and the January examination succeeding their admission, no doubt some would succeed in passing it who otherwise fail. But I doubt if these examinations really increase materially the number of failures. On the contrary, they tend rather to stimulate young men to renewed exertions; while it is also true that any additional number of examinations would not perhaps tend to increase the efficiency of the cadet so as to permit him to remain in the institution. I think there would probably be some under any system who, during the course of the year, would be found deficient.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman from Ohio will pardon me a moment, I should like to say I understand that the principal study which is now carried on by the academy is mathematics; and however highly educated a student of that institution may be in every other branch, if he fails to have a very high mathematical standard, he fails in the institution and is turned out. What I say I know to be true.

The institution is not accomplishing what its founders intended. It is selecting men with peculiar minds, young men who have mathematical minds and nothing else, and they care for nothing else.

I have seen three of the most brilliant young men in my district, who had been examined by the best educators in it and pronounced competent in every branch, who have gone to West Point and been rejected. To-day my district is not represented there. And it is so in many other districts to my knowledge.

I say, therefore, this institution to-day under the present management is not meeting the wants and demands of the country, is not carrying out the object of its creation. And it ought to be hampered and brought down to the very lowest cent that will keep it going till those who are in charge turn their attention to the practical workings of the institution.

Mr. HORR. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. HORR. What method do you take to select your candidates; do you select them by examination or do you select the men yourself?

Mr. COBB. They were selected by means of examinations. I stated that a moment ago.

Mr. HORR. And so selected, did they fail?

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir; and a Republican, too, at that.

Mr. KEIFER. That is extraordinary. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. A candidate selected by examination was perhaps the brightest young man in my district. He was a young man of high education, had taught in one of the high schools of his county, and three superintendents of public instruction, who to-day stand among the highest educators in my State, pronounced him entirely competent in every branch of education. He stood according to their standard ninety-nine, and yet he went to West Point and was rejected. I sent there two others perhaps equally competent as regards education, and they have been rejected. While I believe the young men in my district are as worthy, as competent, as bright in education as you will find them on the average throughout the West, I doubt if there is a young man in my district who can meet the standard set up there.

Mr. HORR. I do not doubt for a moment the statement of the gentleman from Indiana that when he submitted the candidates to the test of examination a Republican was selected; but I do doubt the gentleman's statement that he has not in his district any who can pass the examination of the Military Academy. While I concede the standard is high, I do not think it is higher than the good of the institution and the development of the service require.

Mr. COBB. I do. I differ with the gentleman as to that. I will further say I have tendered the nomination to nine young men in my district and they have all refused it. And why? Because they did not want to incur the expense of going there and then be subjected to the disgrace, as they feel it, of being rejected. I state this publicly, and I will take occasion at some future time of saying more upon this subject.

Mr. BEACH. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. COBB. I have no objection, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] is willing to yield. I have been occupying his time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. KEIFER. I only yielded to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] for an inquiry and not for a continuous colloquy.

Mr. BEACH. I wish to ask only one question.

Mr. KEIFER. I yield to the gentleman from New York for a question.

Mr. BEACH. The question I propose to ask of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB]. That gentleman has made very general charges in regard to the rejection of candidates he had nominated for West Point. Now, it is well known when these candidates are rejected there is a cause for it, and that cause is assigned. Can the gentleman tell the House why the particular candidates he nominated were rejected? If he can, I should like to have him do so.

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir; the cause assigned was that they failed on mathematics. They did not happen to have the finest mathematical minds given to men. They had other qualifications; and some are naturally constituted mathematicians and some are not; and because a young man fails to have a mathematical mind he fails at that institution.

Mr. BEACH. I undertake to say if candidates have not mathematical minds they are unfit for that institution.

Mr. COBB. I did not mean to say what the gentleman implies. They did have a mathematical mind, perhaps superior to many others. But they were not superior to all other men in that respect. That is the point I make. I thank the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] kindly for his indulgence.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not think in the management of this appropriation bill, which is purely an appropriation bill, we are called upon to go into the question as to the standard of examination, or the standard of attainment rather, of these cadets. It may be a very proper thing to criticise if that standard is too high. There might be a very wide difference of opinion as to whether or not a young man who had no sort of taste or who had no sort of attainment in the matter of mathematics could ever become a good soldier, a good engineer officer, or an officer who would understand the general duties of a soldier in time of war or in time of peace.

I want to say for the superintendent of that institution now there, General Wesley Merritt, that he is a very accomplished man in every respect, doing to-day his duty toward this institution and doing his duty toward all the cadets in it. And I want to say there is a unanimous report, without regard to party, made by the board appointed by the President of the United States, by the President of the Senate, and by the Speaker of the last House of Representatives, recommending this institution, and especially the instruction given in it. Everything is highly commended in that report.

But we are dealing with the question of appropriation, and it is our duty to appropriate for those who are likely to be in this institution, to make provision for their comfort, for the purpose of promoting the course of instruction provided there.

Mr. BELFORD. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KEIFER. For how long?

Mr. BELFORD. A few minutes.

Mr. KEIFER. I will yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. BELFORD. I hope I may have the attention of the House for a moment or two. I regard this Military Academy at West Point as the incorporated tyranny of this country, governed by snobs, and supported by men in this House who are practically afraid to place restrictions on that institution.

Talk about educating men for the Army! Cæsar, the great Julius Cæsar—[laughter]. Hold on a moment. I say that the great Julius Cæsar, of whom Shakespeare declared that he was the noblest man in the annals of all time, never commanded a company until he was 46 years old. And have we had a general in this or any other country equal to him? Did the Senate of Rome make an appropriation for some West Point located on the Aventine Mount or at the end of the Appian Way, in which to educate Cæsar or Marius or Sylla or Pompey, or any other of the great generals of that day and generation?

Was General LOGAN of the State of Illinois, one of the best generals we had in the Union Army during the late war, educated at West Point? Was my friend General KEIFER, who fought gallantly through that war, educated at West Point?

The facts about the matter are just as have been stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB]. I represent the State of Colorado, and under the law I have a right to send a boy to this institution and one to Annapolis. I did send one to West Point three years ago, and to-day he stands at par and at a premium [laughter] in every class in that institution. I sent one to the Naval Academy last fall who had been critically examined in my State by a board of scholars and professors. He went down there, and because he could not tell just how many inches a belt should be in length to measure the circumference of this earth, he was refused admission.

Now if we are to support this beggarly and eleemosynary institution I propose we support it under such conditions as we may prescribe, and which the martinets of the Army can neither disregard nor overcome.

Mr. KEIFER. We have had some discussion of this bill and some characteristic remarks upon it. While I do not approve of all that has been said by any means, I may say generally that we are not now dealing with the question of perpetuating this institution.

I do not desire to continue the general debate any further, and of course I do not desire to cut it off if any gentleman thinks it will be profitable to prolong it.

Mr. ELLIS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KEIFER. Very well.

Mr. ELLIS. Will my colleague on the committee inform us about what is the percentage of rejections on the preliminary or first examinations?

Mr. KEIFER. I am not able to tell that, because I have not gone into that matter. If the gentleman has information on that subject he can state it to the House.

Mr. COBB. I can tell the gentleman. The percentage of rejections is 200 per cent.

Mr. KEIFER. That can not be so.

Mr. COBB. That is my recollection.

Mr. ELLIS. The gentleman is sadly wrong in his figures, as wrong in his figures as he is in the line of his argument. The percentage of failures on the primary or preliminary examination is about 5 per cent., and the failures after one year are about 10 per cent.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman is egregiously mistaken, if he will allow me.

Mr. ELLIS. I have my own memory.

Mr. COBB. I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. ELLIS. And I have the floor.

Mr. COBB. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. ELLIS. I have the authority of the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS], who was long a professor in that institution.

Mr. ROSECRANS. The average number of the graduates at the end of four years is about 40 per cent.

Mr. ELLIS. I venture to say that this percentage of failures will not compare unfavorably with any great institution of the country; more especially with the three leading institutions of the country. Many of these rejections are on account of physical causes, not mental. When we know that there are two hundred and seventy-nine cadets there out of a possible three hundred and forty-four, we can see that the institution is pretty well filled. I hold that we ought to demand the very highest grade of scholarship there. These men are not intended for merchants, lawyers, book-keepers, or doctors. Mathematics! Why, sir, mathematics is the very life and essence of modern military education. The day when Andrew Jackson could get behind breastworks and with untutored soldiers repulse a charge; the day when Taylor and Scott with untaught volunteers could overthrow the armies of a nation—those days are gone. War is more and more a science. As weapons become more deadly, as inventions of war become more destructive, as long-range weapons are created, more and more is the science of war dependent upon calculations dealing with the most abstruse mathematical propositions.

Therefore a thorough and complete mathematical education is absolutely necessary for these men, to enable them to calculate distances, to construct military roads, in civil life to conduct the hydrographic, hydrostatic, and geodetic surveys of the country. These young men in those pursuits must deal with the most abstruse principles of mathematics. They should have an education above that of any other young men in this country.

Why, sir, our Army is but a handful of men. In case of war we would have to depend upon the magnificent volunteer spirit of the Americans. We would have to draw our officers from West Point; and the efficiency of our volunteer corps would depend upon the efficiency of the officers.

A nice condition of affairs it would be for Congress to attempt to prescribe the curriculum of West Point! It would be a beautiful curriculum after Congress had dealt with it a while! Let me tell my enthusiastic friend from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] that the days of Julius Cæsar were at least forty or fifty years ago, and that Shakespeare is not a very authentic or reliable historian; that the Cæsarian mode of fighting has gone and gone forever.

Mr. BELFORD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. ELLIS. Certainly.

Mr. BELFORD. The gentleman says that these men need a mathematical education?

Mr. ELLIS. Unquestionably.

Mr. BELFORD. Was Newton educated at West Point?

Mr. ELLIS. No.

Mr. BELFORD. Was La Place educated at West Point?

Mr. ELLIS. No.

Mr. BELFORD. Was Frederick the Great educated at West Point?

Mr. ELLIS. No.

Mr. BELFORD. Was Charles X of Sweden, who had achieved immortality of fame before he was twenty-five years of age, educated at West Point?

Mr. ELLIS. No.

Mr. BELFORD. Well, is not the whole thing a humbug? [Laughter.]

Mr. ELLIS. I will state to the gentleman that so far as the two monarchs he has named are concerned they were educated at the best military schools of their time. I will tell the gentleman also that in our recent civil war the leading commanders who lived and succeeded in their military operations were Sherman and Grant, who, although in civil life at the time the war broke out, were both educated at West Point. These were the men upon whose banners at last perched the victory for the Union.

Mr. BELFORD. And you Democrats declared that Sherman was crazy.

Mr. ELLIS. And of the men on the other side who lived and succeeded, Johnston and Lee, although one was in civil life when the war broke out, were graduates of West Point.

Mr. Chairman, I may say here that the efficiency of our Engineer Corps in the last war saved to the United States, I believe, 100,000 lives. In the capture of those almost impregnable fortresses, Cerro Gordo, Molino del Rey, and Churubusco, and in that magnificent and victory-strewn march of Scott from Vera Cruz to the capital of Mexico, the brilliant triumph of the Army of the United States with the comparatively small expenditure of life was due to the efficiency of the Engineer Corps of the Army. If those officers had not been mathematicians carefully trained—engineers by their very education—they never would have wrought out those problems.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman will allow me to ask, does that detract from what I have said? I do not deny that the officers referred to were educated engineers, but the objection I have to this West Point examination and the manner in which it is conducted is that under this system the young men are not allowed to be educated, but are required to be educated before they go there. I admit that our officers should have a mathematical education before going into the service; certain branches of the service require it; but must a young man have this mathematical education before he is allowed to enter West Point? That is where he goes to be educated; he should not be required to be educated before he goes there.

Mr. ELLIS. Why, Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman informed himself as to the branches in which these young men are examined? They are reading, writing, and arithmetic not higher, I believe, than vulgar fractions. That is the extent of the education required for admission. They are not required to go into algebra or Euclid. The professors simply demand that a candidate shall be well versed and grounded in the elements of an ordinary English education.

Mr. COBB. But an examination is required in mathematics.

Mr. ELLIS. My information is that it does not go further than arithmetic.

Mr. COBB. Well, I will not make the assertion positively.

Mr. ELLIS. No doubt the gentleman can find in Indiana some young man well worthy to represent his district at that institution.

Mr. RANDALL addressed the Chair.

Mr. KEIFER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire some time?

Mr. RANDALL. Only a few moments.

Mr. KEIFER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to call the committee back to the consideration of the bill that is before us. These complaints, whether just or not, are inappropriate as leveled at this bill; they apply only to the administration of the institution, and that, whether proper or not, is not within the purview of the Committee on Appropriations, but belongs to the Committee on Military Affairs, who should bring in a bill correcting whatever is wrong. For myself, I believe that West Point should have the highest possible standard. The best intellects of the country should be sought out and placed there, so as to be useful to the country in the future. It happens we do not want a full academy just now. We would prefer to have only one-half the number graduated, but we want that half shall be the finest intellects which can be developed in the United States.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I concur with the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. RANDALL], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, we should devote ourselves to the subject before the committee. I wish to say that not all of the officers of the United States Army are graduates of West Point; that while a great number of the officers graduated at West Point, still a large percentage of the officers of the United States Army were appointed from civil life. There is a considerable number of the officers of the United States Army, from general officers down, who have been selected from civil life. And during the war, when they say there were persons who came from civil life who did much toward the successful conduct of the war, I wish to say, having the right to speak from that standpoint, those who accomplished anything owed a great deal for it to the education they obtained during the war, directly or indirectly, from accomplished graduates of the Military Academy. We are a growing country, with a large population, and we are liable to have war again; so that the more we can diffuse this sort of education among our people by such an institution the better it will be for us. If we are prepared for war we are less likely to have it.

This country, Mr. Chairman, in the first century of its existence was engaged on an average one year out of six in war, excluding Indian wars from that calculation. It is a singular fact that one-sixth of the time in the first century of the existence of our country was years of war, and I do not speak of Indian wars.

But I do not propose to prolong this discussion myself, but will yield to other gentlemen.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will the gentleman yield to me for five minutes.

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I would not prolong this discussion, especially when it antagonizes my friends on my left, who are having an animated conversation. [Laughter.] I would like to place on record this fact: that the money we give to West Point and Annapolis does not produce the proper percentage of education produced by other institutions. Of that I am satisfied; and I wish we could have some committee made up of intelligent men—I do not mean professors, but men with old-fashioned, homely gumption like you, sir [laughter]—to go to Annapolis or West Point to see to it our money is not wasted. Why, not one-third of the students who go to West Point are admitted. They scare them to death by some sort of examination. I wish I could tell all I knew in five minutes. I will not do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HORR. Take fifteen.

Mr. COX, of New York. My friend from Colorado must have had some sort of inspiration to this business. [Laughter.] For, notwithstanding what may be said as to other matters, I do know that snobbery rules at West Point; not republicanism, not democracy, not old-fashioned ways at West Point now as when it graduated Grant and Slocum. We require a new deal, as something strange to the American people now controls at West Point.

I would desire, not on this bill, but some time hereafter, to have a committee named to investigate this whole business. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], the head of this committee, says truly that we have now to vote in committee for these appropriations. The Committee on Military Affairs have not proposed any changes in the law. All we can do now is to give our sanction to carry out the law as it exists. But I would propose hereafter, when the committee goes to West Point, that they will not go there to be wise and blind, and make a report utterly useless and senseless so far as it regards the real educational system we propose to practice at that institution.

Mr. KEIFER. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND].

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Louisiana in all that he says of the achievements of those who have gone out from West Point into our military service. I have before me now a declaration of General Scott which is a more fitting tribute to the utility of West Point in preparing the commanders and officers for the wars in which this country has been engaged than anything I can say.

General Scott said on one occasion that—

> I give it as my fixed opinion that but for our graduated cadets the war between the United States and Mexico might, and probably would, have lasted some four or five years, within its first half more defeats than victories falling to our share; whereas within less that two years we conquered a great country and a peace without the loss of a single battle or skirmish.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while I concur in what has been uttered in favor of sustaining this institution at West Point, I at the same time feel a strong sympathy with my friend from Indiana [Mr. COBB] in his suggestion that the high standard established there for the admission of cadets has worked disadvantageously to the sons of the poorer classes.

I have had difficulty in finding those who could pass the ordeal of examinations at West Point. During my six years in Congress I have made repeated efforts to secure the admission of candidates there. I failed in several attempts, notwithstanding I selected bright and well-educated young men in every instance. Some, after admission, preferred to leave the academy by resigning than to remain and endure the extraordinarily severe mental and physical training. I have a young man there now who I feel confident will remain and graduate with honors, but previous to his appointment those I had selected either failed in the preliminary examinations or resigned after a year or more experience because of the physical hardships or severe mental discipline required.

I am satisfied that there are two faults in regard to this matter: first, that the preliminary examination required for the admission of candidates is too high; and second, that the length of the term is too short. I believe that a very large percentage of the failures at West Point resulting in the examinations subsequent to the preliminary test is due to the fact that there is an attempt to crowd into four years' studies what in the natural course of things should be left to a period of at least six.

In looking over the branches in which a candidate is examined at the preliminary examination you will find that they are considerably more than have been mentioned by the gentleman from Louisiana. They not only consist of an examination in reading, writing, orthography, and arithmetic, but grammar, composition, history, and other subjects, and the examination in these different branches is very thorough. In arithmetic the standard is high enough to require such a thorough knowledge as to render it unnecessary for further study in order that the candidate may take up at once the higher branches of mathematics. In history the examination is very thorough. The history of the United States especially must be most thoroughly understood, as the examination is very rigid.

I have been informed that a young man failed of admission because he could not give the name of the vessel upon which Columbus sailed when he made his famous voyage resulting in the discovery of America. They are required to know many other things like that which might even escape the recollection of a person well read in history. I am advised of another instance where a bright young fellow was kept out of the academy because he failed to spell some word correctly. Perhaps in both these instances other unimportant failures in examinations were found as well as those mentioned, due to a lack of opportunity for early instruction. Is a familiarity of such details necessary in a boy to qualify him for duty in the military service?

I want to see some reasonable standard of examination established. There is undoubtedly room for reform in this respect. I do not say that I am capable of accomplishing it; but I believe that if the examination was not so rigid, and if the term was lengthened somewhat, there would be more admissions from our Western States. It is a well-known fact, Mr. Chairman, that many of our poor but bright and able young men in the West do not enjoy the opportunity for training and educational acquirements that are within the reach of those who live East or those of more wealthy parents.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have but five minutes, otherwise I should be glad to do so. I was informed by President Hayes and the then Adjutant-General of the Army that in their opinion the standard at the preliminary examination was too high and the term at West Point was too short. It precluded many of the young men who were appointed from the Western States and who had not had opportunities of such education as enabled candidates from the Eastern States to secure their admissions. Many of the wealthier class send their sons to Europe for preparation in the schools there to enable them to pass the ordeal of an examination for admission at West Point. Of course boys having such training will surpass those whose poverty or lack of opportunity prevent them from more thorough preparation. I sympathize, therefore, with the gentlemen from Colorado and from Indiana in their remarks that the standard ought to be lowered so that our young men in the West might be placed upon a par with the sons of those who live in more favored localities and who are able to secure the advantages of a thorough education, and that the sons of the poor as well as those of the rich may obtain admission and graduation at the national Military Academy. If this is not to be an aristocratic institution, a reform in this respect should be inaugurated.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KEIFER. How much time?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. For a single remark.

Mr. KEIFER. I will yield to the gentleman one minute.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I only want, Mr. Chairman, to say to my friends from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] and from Indiana [Mr. COBB] that if they have any trouble about getting their appointees into West Point from their districts I can furnish them with any number of young men from my district who will pass the examination required at that institution.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. One word in reply to my colleague from Illinois. I would infer from what the gentleman has stated that the board at West Point has perhaps extended favors and leniency to young men from that gentleman's district that it has not extended to young men from my district.

Mr. BEACH. They do not extend any favors at all.

Mr. LYMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] yield to me?

Mr. KEIFER. How much time?

Mr. LYMAN. Half a minute. I would like to ask my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], simply for my own information, on what system he makes appointments?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have adopted the competitive-examination system.

Mr. SPRINGER. In accordance with the principles of civil-service reform.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And I find it works well.

Mr. LYMAN. If the candidates are selected according to the principles of civil-service reform they will go in every time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Many of the cadets who pass the preliminary examination fail subsequently, because of the very severe tax upon them in consequence of crowding upon them studies which should occupy a much longer period than that allowed by law.

Mr. KEIFER. It may have been very well for this discussion about the standard of attainment required to have gone on for a while. But I think we have had enough of it. I ask that the bill be now read by paragraphs for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment, and read the following:

For pay of eight assistant professors, in addition to pay as first lieutenants, $4,000.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to strike out the last word.

I have listened with great interest to what has been said on the other side of this House by distinguished gentlemen with reference to the Military Academy at West Point, and I am glad it has been suggested by the gentleman from New York that when the wining and dining, serenading and dancing parties go out from this House—

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order. I can not hear what the gentleman from Colorado says.

Mr. BELFORD. I can not hear it either. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Mr. BELFORD. I was saying it was of absolute importance to this nation that when the Congressional committee visits this academy supported by national aid, instead of wining and dining and serenading and dancing, they give this institution some special attention. I aver it to be a fact, and I challenge contradiction on that subject, that if I have a son at West Point and go there to visit him and put up at a first-class hotel, the military autocrats of that institution will not allow my son to call on me or his mother. That is the spirit of the institution.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. BELFORD. I have not time.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman gives a challenge and will not allow an answer.

Mr. BELFORD. I make the statement and I challenge contradiction.

Mr. STEELE. I contradict it.

Mr. BELFORD. I accept your contradiction as an honorable man; but still the fact remains eternal as the foundations of the earth. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. If the gentleman will give me time——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield?

Mr. BELFORD. I can not give up my time to the gentleman.

I say it is time for the Congress of the United States, which votes hundreds of thousands of dollars every year to keep that institution going, to institute some inquiry in reference to the manner in which it is being conducted. We know that in the Forty-sixth Congress when a colored boy was sent to that school, representing as he did at least five millions of people, they hazed him because God had made his face black instead of white. I therefore say that the professors are snobs and the scholars are aristocrats, and for such people we ought to make no appropriation at all.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BELFORD. Hold on. I am not through yet.

What I desire to call the attention of the House to, if I have got the time, is this: We ought to have a preliminary school at West Point where we can educate candidates that are sent from our various States. Educate them there for two years, fit them for the academy, and at the end of two years they are on the highway to military enlightenment. That is the wise and judicious thing for this Congress to do. But we will never accomplish a result so wise and beneficent as that until we send some gentlemen to West Point to examine the details and operations of that institution who have not got swallow-tailed coats and canary neck-ties. [Great laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. I propose in a moment or two to ask the committee to rise. Meanwhile I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE].

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] is always edifying, and what he says is always to the point. But he would only have us believe there is as much truth in what he has just stated as there was in his statement when he said a few days since that he paid the postage on a hundred letters with 50 cents, or when he claims that he gets up in the morning at 5 o'clock and sets about answering one hundred letters a day.

Mr. BELFORD. If the gentleman doubts it let him come round and see me.

Mr. STEELE. I say it is one of the grand institutions of the country; and the only fault the people who are familiar with its workings find with it is that there are not more graduates sent abroad every year in the country to different avocations in civil life, but ready for war should their services be required, than there are. There are too many professors and officers for the number of graduates.

Mr. LAIRD. Will the gentleman yield to me——

Mr. STEELE. I have but two minutes and can not yield.

That is the one fault of the institution. The people of this country owe it much. Notwithstanding there are many volunteers on this floor who think they did about all in putting down the late war, I venture to assert that if we had had ten times as many men graduated from this academy as we had when war came to have distributed among the volunteer regiments of the North we would not to-day have so many graves filled with men because the officers who commanded them did not know how to take care of them. There never was better material for officers or soldiers than we had in the volunteer army, but they did not know how to take care of themselves or to drill, manage their camps or cooking until they had bought the knowledge by dear experience, and there were more deaths at the commencement of the war from the want of this knowledge on the part of volunteer officers than there were from any other cause. The officers and soldiers of that war are now physically incapacitated for war as a rule; let us, therefore, be prepared better when our sons or their boys are called upon.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If we had had as many officers in the Army from West Point as the gentleman suggests the war would have been going on yet.

Mr. STEELE. Oh, no; we had for our Northern army of over two millions of soldiers but few over two hundred officers of experience. I was a volunteer officer myself from May 2, 1861, to the close of the war, and our officers and soldiers during the last year were as efficient in every way as ever did battle; at the same time I know that there were a great many regiments, and in fact brigades, in 1861 and 1862 that were without any military training or teachers, and I do not think there is an ex-officer of volunteers here who will controvert the statement that we lost very much by it.

I will insert that part of the regulations of the academy which especially provides for allowing cadets to visit relatives and others, which will be found on page 72:

291. Written permits to visit their relatives and others at the hotel will be granted to cadets by the commandant of cadets; they must specify the time of the visit and the name and exact degree of relationship of the person on whom the cadet may wish to call; and no cadet shall go to the hotel at any time without such permission.

Mr. LAIRD. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. KEIFER. I can not give way further. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly, Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLAND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 155, noes 10.

And accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. BLAIR. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Ordered, That the papers on the files of the Senate with Senate bill 1377, Forty-seventh Congress, be referred to the Committee on Finance, in connection with Senate bill 1525, Forty-eighth Congress.

FALSE PERSONATION OF GOVERNMENT OFFICERS.

Mr. GARLAND. If there is no further morning business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1563) providing for the punishment of persons falsely personating officers and employés of the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is a bill of general importance, and a bill that ought to have been passed and become a law at the last session of Congress. It is important that early action should be taken upon it, and in view of that fact I shall interpose no objection to its present consideration.

Mr. GARLAND. The bill passed the Senate at the last session without any debate, but was not reached in the other House. I hold in my hand now a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions urging its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas?

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments, in line 6, after the word "Department," to insert "or any officer;" and in line 10, after the word "Department," to insert "or any officer;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c, That every person who, with intent to defraud either the United States or any person, falsely assumes or pretends to be an officer or employé acting under the authority of the United States, or any Department or any officer of the Government thereof, and who shall take upon himself to act as such, or who shall in such pretended character demand or obtain from any person or from the United States, or any Department or any officer of the Government thereof, any money, paper, document, or other valuable thing, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment not longer than three years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN FRASER.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will now lay before the Senate the Calendar, under the eighth rule, commencing with Order of Business No. 92, being the bill (S. 830) for the relief of John Fraser.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill, the pending question being on the amendment reported from the Committee on Claims to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the sum of $742.33 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment in full to John Fraser for services as Supervising Architect of the Treasury from December 6, 1878, to May 22, 1879.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the report was read yesterday, but as it is short it may be read again.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HOAR January 23, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 830) for the relief of John Fraser, have considered the same, and report:

Mr. Fraser, an eminent architect, was employed by the United States to superintend the construction of the building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in his professional capacity. While he was so employed Mr. Hill, Supervising Architect of the Treasury, was suspended from office from December 5, 1878, to May 22, 1879, by an order from the Secretary of the Treasury. At the latter date he was restored. Mr. Fraser was directed by the Secretary of the Treasury to take charge of the office and perform the duties of Supervising Architect during the suspension of Mr. Hill from duty. He obeyed the order and performed the duties of the office during the period above named. He has received pay at the rate of $8 per day for his services in superintending said building. We think he is fairly entitled to be paid in addition the difference between his compensation as superintendent and the salary provided by law for the Supervising Architect for the time during which he performed the duties of both positions. This difference amounts to $742.33. We therefore report the following as a substitute for the bill, and recommend its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Claims.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VAN WYCK subsequently said: I ask leave to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 830) for the relief of John Fraser was passed. I will state my purpose in entering the motion. As I said yesterday, this matter is more fully understood by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], of the committee, and there was a miscalculation as to the figures. The committee intended to report some two or three hundred dollars more. Then there was still another matter which had been called to the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts and which he examined. Therefore I desire the bill to remain open until his return, and I enter a motion to reconsider the vote, so that the bill may be called up at some future time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska enters, as he has a right to do under the rule, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 830) for the relief of John Fraser was passed. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

BRIDGE OBSTRUCTIONS TO NAVIGATION.

The bill (S. 462) to provide for the removal of obstructions to the free navigation of the navigable waters of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments. The first amendment of the committee will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 9, after the word "draw-opening," it is proposed to insert the words "or the raft-span;" so as to read:

That whenever the Secretary of War shall have good reason to believe that any railroad or other bridge now or hereafter to be constructed over any of the navigable waters of the United States, under authority of the United States or of any State or Territory, is an obstruction to the free navigation of such waters, by reason of difficulty in passing the draw-opening or the raft-span of said bridge, by rafts, steamboats, or other water craft, it shall be the duty of the said Secretary, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be reported.

Mr. SEWELL. I should like to have the amendments printed.

Mr. MCMILLAN. They have been printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments are printed.

Mr. SEWELL. As a part of the bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. SEWELL. Has the bill been printed as amended?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by committees are always printed. On such a report of a committee there is a reprint of the bill with the amendments. The second amendment of the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 12, after the word "owning," it is proposed to insert "controlling or operating;" so as to read:

On satisfactory proof thereof, to require the company or persons owning, controlling, or operating said bridge to cause such aids to the passage of said draw-opening.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 13, after the word "draw-opening," to insert "or of said raft-span, or of both said draw-opening and raft-span;" so as to read:

To cause such aids to the passage of said draw-opening or of said raft-span, or of both said draw-opening and raft-span, to be constructed, placed, and maintained, at their own cost and expense, in the form of booms, dikes, piers, or other suitable and proper structures.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 18, after the word "opening," to insert "or span, or both said opening or span;" so as to read:

Structures for the guiding of said rafts, steamboats, and other water craft safely through said opening or span, or both said opening and span, as shall be specified in his order in that behalf.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. There is no written report I believe with this bill. I wish that we may have some explanation of it. It seems to be an important bill, very sweeping in its character, and I wish the member of the committee having it in charge would make some explanation of it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This is a bill which has been framed in pursuance of suggestions from the engineer of the Army in charge of the improvements upon the Upper Mississippi River, particularly Capt. A. Mackenzie. In his report he gives details of very extensive losses occasioned by the destruction of rafts and steamboats upon the Mississippi River striking against the piers of bridges erected in the stream. The losses are stated by him in his report to the War Department. In one of his reports, in his conclusion, he says:

If we make a comparison of the three estimates of loss and damage to lumber interests above given, adding a reasonable amount for loss by accident and delay to freight and passenger boats and barges, we may fairly estimate the total loss to the interests of navigation at least $175,000 per annum, solely due to the existence of bridges across the Mississippi River.

Every bridge that may in the future be built will add its quota to that amount. Assuming that 70 per cent. of this loss might be avoided by proper structures at the various bridges, it becomes evident that $122,000 per annum can be saved by such improvements.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. MACKENZIE,
Captain of Engineers.

The CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, United States Army.

I have read a summary of the detailed statement in his report. The bill merely authorizes the Secretary of War, upon satisfactory proof to him of the necessity for protections at the draw-openings or the raft spans of the bridges crossing the river, to require the bridge companies to erect such booms or protections as will enable rafts and steamboats to safely pass through the draw-openings or under the raft-spans of the bridges. The loss has come to be so great and the damage and injury to persons engaged in the business of rafting and steamboating are such, that this is regarded as an essential protection to those interests upon the river.

The bill was fully considered at the last session of Congress in the Senate. It passed the Senate, and only failed in the House of Representatives for want of sufficient time. There is nothing in the bill that is oppressive in any way, and it is absolutely necessary to the protection of the public interests. If we are to have these navigable streams interrupted by bridges they must have connected with them all the safeguards and protections that can be thrown about them. The navigation of these streams is too important to be unnecessarily impaired. The Mississippi River is one of the great channels of commerce in the country, and while it is necessary that bridges shall be erected across that stream, yet the public interests will require that every safeguard should attend them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. SEWELL. I should like to ask the honorable Senator a question. Does not each act which authorizes the construction of a bridge under the supervision of the Secretary of War provide all these safeguards?

Mr. McMILLAN. Oh, no; none of these.

Mr. SEWELL. Then I withdraw any objection to the bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. There may be a single act or two that does provide sufficient safeguards, but unless there is a special provision to that effect it does not.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McPHERSON. I rise to ask unanimous consent of the Senate to suspend the Calendar of business so that we may now consider the special order, which is the bank bill, so called. We have now been ten or twelve days considering it, and as the Senate has agreed to adjourn over until Monday, and another special order is fixed for Monday, the bill of the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], it seems to me as though the bank bill should be proceeded with at once, and finished to-day. It will be as easy to return to the Calendar if we have any time after we reach a vote on the bill as to continue the Calendar now. I move that the Calendar of business be suspended, and that we proceed to the consideration of the special order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will not make that motion until 1 o'clock. I am willing to give the hour between 1 and 2.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then I give notice that at 1 o'clock I will renew the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The consideration of the bills on the Calendar will be proceeded with.

MILLIE E. HAYS.

The bill (S. 1252) for the relief of Millie E. Hays, widow of John Hays, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the proper officers of the Interior Department to prepare and cause to be issued and delivered to Millie E. Hays, widow of John Hays, deceased, a bounty land-warrant for eighty acres of land, upon the surrender of bounty land-warrant numbered 26454, issued under the act of Congress of September 28, 1850, in such form that the same can be located by Millie E. Hays, or assigned and transferred by her and located by her assignee, as other land-warrants are located upon the public lands.

Mr. PLATT. Let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PLUMB January 24, 1884:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 356) for the relief of Millie E. Hays, widow of John Hays, deceased, make the following report:

Having duly considered the same and accompanying papers, the committee recommend that it pass as amended.

The facts upon which this recommendation is based are as follows:

John Hays did, on October 9, 1852, at the United States land office at Shawneetown, in the State of Illinois, attempt to locate bounty land-warrant No. 26454, for eighty acres of land, issued under the act of Congress of September 28, 1850, to John Sullivan, upon the south half of the northwest quarter of section numbered 2, in township numbered 8 south and range numbered 3 east, and the said John Hays had purchased the said land-warrant in good faith, and paid the full value therefor, from Robert M. Hundley, now of the city of Marion, in Williamson County, Illinois, and procured the said Hundley to make the said location of said bounty land-warrant upon said land in the name of said John Hays, and the said Robert M. Hundley finding the entire back part of said warrant covered by the written assignment of the said John Sullivan and the requisite certificates thereto, did, in good faith and honesty, erase the name of the party from whom he had purchased the said warrant and to whom the said John Sullivan had so assigned the same on the back thereof, and insert the name of the said John Hays, to whom he had sold the said warrant, and Robert M. Hundley did thereupon complete the location of said warrant upon the said land in the name of the said John Hays, so far as the same could be done at the said local land office, and deliver the said land-warrant to the register and the receiver of the said land office, and did receive from the said local land officers a duplicate receipt of said location, and the local land officers did forward the said land-warrant, with the said John Hays's name written over the said erasure in the said assignment, with one of the duplicate receipts of the said location in the name of said Hays, to the General Land Office at Washington, D. C., and the Commissioner of the General Land Office suspended the said location because of the said erasure in the said assignment thereof, and returned the said land-warrant to the said local land office for correction, and the said John Hays was unable to perfect the assignment as required, not being able to find the said John Sullivan or the party whose name had been erased, and in 1856 returned the said land-warrant to the General Land Office, and in 1860 the Commissioner of the General Land Office addressed a letter to said Hays, advising him of said suspension, and in 1878 the duplicate receipt of the said location thereof was sent to the General Land Office, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office returned the said land-warrant, with a copy of said letter, to said Hays, advising him of the suspension, and the said land-warrant was again returned to the General Land Office, with the affidavits of the said Hays and the said Hundley explaining the said erasure and assignment, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office refused to issue a patent until the assignment was perfected as required, and returned the said land-warrant with the affidavits thereto attached, and advising that cash could be substituted for the warrant and a patent issue in the name of John Hays, and a cash payment for the said land was thereupon made to the General Land Office in lieu of the attempted location of said bounty land-warrant, and a patent issued to the said John Hays, and a duplicate warrant was refused to be issued without special legislation, and the said John Hays was the actual and real owner of said land-warrant, without the pretension or assertion of any claim thereto by any person whomsoever, and departed this life in the year 1879, leaving his widow, the said Millie E. Hays, entitled to said land-warrant.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GRAIN-SHOVEL PATENT.

The bill (S. 638) for the relief of George Milsom, Henry Spendelow, and George V. Watson was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLATT. This is a report in favor of the extension of a patent known as the grain-shovel. Since the report was made there has been a good deal of opposition manifested to the bill, and parties in opposition have desired to be heard, and as time has been fixed for the hearing, on the 13th of March, I think the bill ought not to lose its place on the Calendar. If the committee should reconsider their action, of course that would probably be the end of the bill; but if not, the parties in whose favor the report has been made I think are entitled to an early consideration of their case. I should like to have the unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill may stand at the head of the Calendar, to be passed over until after the hearing and report of the committee; or if that can not be done I shall object pro forma so as to transfer the bill to the Calendar of General Orders and let it stand there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the bill now under consideration may be passed over, to keep its place at the head of the Calendar of procedure under Rule VIII. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. This is a very important bill and I am very glad to learn that the Committee on Patents propose to hear the opposition to the bill. If they do not hear it, it will certainly be heard in the Senate. This is a bill that affects every man in the United States who raises wheat, corn, or oats to be placed in the market. It is a virtual tax, as those of us who oppose the bill believe, upon all agricultural products, and we shall be very much gratified if the Committee on Patents give this case and those opposed to it a full hearing.

These patents have expired; parties are using these patented articles free, and now it is proposed to give new life to the exclusive monopoly and rob these parties of their property. I have no objection to this case going on the Calendar under Rule IX. I make that suggestion to the Senator from Connecticut. It is so near the head of the Calendar that there will be no trouble about it, provided we have notice of the action of the committee after the 13th of March and then reasonable notice when the bill will be called up.

Mr. PLATT. Representing the committee, I will say that I am much obliged to the Senator from Missouri for the information which he has submitted to the committee. I am always glad to hear him, whether in the Senate or before the committee. Perhaps the best way is to object pro forma and let the bill be transferred to the Calendar of General Orders.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made and the bill goes over.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senator whether by its being transferred to the other Calendar it will come up earlier?

Mr. PLATT. It will come up after 2 o'clock, when it is reached in the business that is to come up after 2 o'clock. Of course we do not desire to have any hearing on this matter in the Senate until after the parties appear before the committee.

Mr. LOGAN. Whatever action will delay the bill so that a hearing can be had is the action that I should prefer, for the reason that I have received quite a number of letters and petitions in opposition to the passage of this bill from constituents of mine that I desire to lay before the committee if they are going to rehear this case. I want to secure a fair hearing before the committee for those who petition us. I have no disposition to obstruct the bill in any way so far as action is concerned, and merely say now that it is such a bill as I shall have to oppose myself on account of the knowledge I have in reference to the interests of my constituents. I desire delay given so that a hearing may be had. Whichever motion will give that delay is the one I prefer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

CALIFORNIA SCHOOL LANDS.

The bill (S. 1024) to authorize the State of California to select other lands in place of sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections returned as mineral was announced as next in order.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in line 3, section 1, after the word "select," to insert "from the unoccupied surveyed public lands within the State;" so as to make the section read:

That the State of California shall have the right to select from the unoccupied surveyed public lands within the State an equal quantity of other lands in lieu of such sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections in said State as are returned as mineral land by the United States deputy surveyors, or are reserved as mineral land by the United States; and such sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections shall thereupon be subject to disposal by the United States as other land of like character.

Mr. PLUMB. I reported this bill myself from the Committee on Public Lands. I have no doubt in the world that it is right in principle; that in some way this indemnity which is sought ought to be granted; but I have had certain representations made to me from various sources in regard to the possible effect of the bill in its present condition, that, with a carelessness which I ought to ask to be excused on account of, I did not bring to the notice of the Senator from California who introduced this bill. I ask that the bill go over, retaining its place on the Calendar until in some reasonable time I may be able to investigate the matter and make sure of my own belief in regard to what should be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

Mr. PLUMB. I intend it to remain on the Calendar subject to consideration under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can not be done without unanimous consent.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent to let it remain in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the bill now under consideration be passed over, to retain its place under the procedure under Rule VIII. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER, of California. I think we can obviate the difficulty the Senator finds in this bill by striking out the second section. There is no trouble about the bill and no complaint except in regard to the second section.

Mr. PLUMB. On account of the confusion in the Chamber I can not hear the remarks of the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is really out of order, objection being made to the bill; but by unanimous consent the Senator from California may proceed.

Mr. PLUMB. I will withdraw the objection in order to hear the statement of the Senator from California.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I was about to state that the only objection which has been made to this bill is to the second section, which provides that the State may take the lieu lands in any land district in the State, the law now being that they shall be taken in the land district in which the reserved lands are situated. So if we strike out the second section we do away with all the objection made to this bill from any quarter whatever.

There is no doubt about it being right and proper that California should have her lieu lands in place of mineral lands reserved by the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections. I am willing to strike out the second section and let the bill pass.

Mr. PLUMB. The principal objection has been on account of the second section. I did not think when the matter was under consideration that that section ought to be stricken out, but the representations that were made to me afterward led me to think that perhaps it ought to be.

But there is still another objection which I am not going to say has had any particular effect upon my mind, and that is in regard to mineral lands, for which indemnity is to be had, being only such as have been reported as mineral. I think if the Senator will let the matter go over we can arrive at something that will answer the purpose. There is no doubt in the world that California has a substantial claim against the United States for indemnity in some shape.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Very well; let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over, retaining its place under the procedure provided for by Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 448) to fix the times for holding the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States in the northern district of Iowa; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

SENATE CONTINGENT FUND.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections a joint resolution, the passage of which is necessary to-day in order to enable a subcommittee authorized for that purpose to continue their operations. I therefore ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution, in order that it may be sent to the other House.

The joint resolution (S. R. 64) providing for the addition of $10,000 to the contingent fund of the Senate was read the first time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be added to the contingent fund of the Senate, "for expenses of special and select committees," for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the third time at length, and passed.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. McPHERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Calendar be suspended and the unfinished business be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1155. The Senator is entitled to make the motion, the Chair thinks. Will the Senate agree to the motion?

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. MORGAN, to insert as additional sections the following:

SEC. —. That when any bonds of the United States deposited in the Treasury by a banking association to secure its circulation are called and paid by the Government, such banking association shall have the right to substitute in the place thereof bonds issued by any of the States; and the bonds so deposited, as to their assignment, management, control, sale, or disposal, shall in all respects be subject to the laws which govern the said banking associations and the officers and agents of the United States with respect to the bonds for which said State bonds are substituted, so far as the same are applicable. But said bonds of the States shall not be received as a substitute for bonds of the United States, so called, and paid at a rate exceeding — per cent. of their value on the face thereof; nor shall the bonds of any State be received on deposit unless the interest theretofore accrued on the same for the period of five years previous to such deposit shall have been duly paid; nor shall any such bonds be so received on deposit when the same are worth less than par in the city of New York.

SEC. —. That the interest accruing on such State bonds after the same are assigned and deposited in accordance with this act shall be received by the Treasurer of the United States and placed to the credit of the banking association that has deposited the bonds, and shall be paid over to such banking association, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct that the same shall be retained in the Treasury to make good any depreciation in the value of the State bonds deposited by such banking association, or because of the failure of any banking association to provide funds as required by law to redeem its circulation, or because of its failure to pay any sum of money that may be charged to such banking association on the books of the Treasury Department.

SEC. —. That at any time that the Secretary of the Treasury shall conclude that a sale of such State bonds so deposited is necessary for the security or protection of the Government of the United States in respect of the redemption of the circulation which such bonds are deposited to secure, he shall proceed to cause said bonds to be sold, in the open market in New York, to the highest bidder for cash, and such sale shall convey a complete title to said bonds to the purchaser; but no such sale shall be made until after thirty days from the date of a notice that the Secretary of the Treasury shall give to the banking association that has deposited such State bonds, requiring such banking association to redeem said bonds by the deposit in the Treasury of the sum of lawful money of the United States equal to so much of the circulation of such banking association as such State bonds were deposited to secure. And if, after the sale of such bonds, any deficit remains in the sum required to redeem the circulation of any such banking association to the extent that the same is based upon and secured by such bonds, such banking association shall pay the same into the Treasury of the United States within thirty days after it has been notified of the amount of the deficit by the Secretary of the Treasury; and failing so to pay such deficit, such banking association shall forfeit its charter, and shall be put into liquidation in accordance with the laws governing the winding up of such associations.

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations for carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, in discussing yesterday another amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] I went over the ground I desired to present to the Senate in respect of this amendment. The project which I advance in this amendment is a new one and I regret that it has not had opportunity to be considered by the Committee on Finance. I am very well aware that no measure relating to the finances of the country ought to be passed through the Senate as a general proposition without its having been first considered by the Committee on Finance, and I would certainly in the interest of the proposition I have brought forward have had it referred to that committee and considered by it if I had known that this discussion was to arise so soon in the session. My engagements, however, have interrupted my thoughts on this question and I had to present it as best I might.

I have this morning introduced into the Senate a bill precisely in the terms of the amendment which I offered yesterday, intending to have that bill sent to the committee, as it has been already sent, and to ask the committee to give it consideration. I think the proposition involved in the bill and in this amendment merits attention. I think it is entirely a safe proposition, and I have attempted to put all the guards I could into the bill so that no evil might arise from it. Perhaps in this I have not been successful.

I am not disposed to trust my own judgment or my own skill in matters of this kind to the extent of being willing to thrust before the Senate or the country a bill touching so delicate a question as the finances of the country, without having the concurrent opinion of men who are selected because of their ability in such matters and placed upon a committee which has charge of subjects akin to this.

I will vote for the bill as reported by the committee, and my amendment was intended to operate as additional sections to that bill. In doing so, however, I must say that I consider that the measure of relief that is afforded to the country by the bill of the committee is inadequate except for a temporary purpose. We shall very soon overtake the provision of this bill and find ourselves in as constrained a position and in about as dangerous an attitude as we occupy to-day, an attitude which has excited the apprehension of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency and of all the financial men of the United States.

As I took occasion to observe yesterday, there could scarcely be a more unsatisfactory condition of the public mind upon any question than the apprehension which exists to-day of some coming evil. We ought to have a system of currency and finance in this country which has in it such elements of stability as will enable all the different industrial, commercial, and business men of the country to predicate their business operations safely upon it. That we have not. We have a system now which is destroying itself from the necessity that our own laws put us under to pay the bonded debt of the United States, and any measure of relief that is safe ought to be resorted to if it coincides in its operations with the experience of this country.

The national banks have furnished to us ever since they were first adopted a uniform currency through the United States, and of later years that currency, by one expedient of legislation and another, has been brought to par for gold and silver. We are therefore not permitted, in the light of our own experience, to withdraw our confidence at this time from a system which has produced results like this. If I were well convinced that there were errors and troubles in that system which should cause it to be repealed in the coming years, I would for the present, and in the light of our own experience, hesitate to withdraw my confidence from a system that has produced so much good in this country.

Then it becomes necessary that we shall help that system out, and we have a very limited opportunity for doing it, for all our governments, State and national, are rapidly getting out of debt, and our paper-money system is based entirely and exclusively upon public indebtedness. So as this debt is vanishing the system itself commences to topple, and it must be a very short time until it will go into ruin unless we provide some other means for the supply of the circulating medium which we put to the country through this system. Are we to abandon the national banking system entirely? Are we to become bankers directly as a government? Or shall we still hold on to the national banks as a proper, legitimate, constitutional, and tried fiscal agency, standing between the Government and the people and adjusting the issue and the contraction of the currency from time to time according to the demands and necessities of the people as expressed in their dealings with the banks?

I hope, sir, that we shall never see the day when notes and bills of exchange can be offered at the Treasury of the United States for discount, and when the Government of the United States shall be conducting out of hand, I may say, a banking system; and yet if we rely entirely upon the Treasury-note system and undertake to supply the commercial demands of this county simply through Treasury notes, when we have passed the boundaries of our expenditures and we can not find a sufficient means of distributing these Treasury notes through the current annual expenditures of the Government of the United States, then in order to get this money into the hands of people who need its use we shall be compelled to resort to the direct system of banking, and bills of exchange or something like them will be discounted at the Treasury of the United States. Then, sir, the apprehension of Senators in respect of the profligacy of legislation will be realized, to the destruction of the best interests of this country.

An example of that, sir, arises in my mind from the recollection of a period in the history of my own State. The people of Alabama, though strongly Democratic, at one time took a fancy that the best thing they could do for themselves was to go into the pet banking system. They went abroad and they borrowed $20,000,000 of money, for which they gave their bonds payable in London and the interest payable in London in sterling exchange or in gold at 6 per cent. per annum interest. Upon the basis of the money obtained by the sale of those bonds they organized a system of banks called the State Bank and its branches. They went on for some years, they were so happy in their prosperity, making money for the people, that the citizens of Alabama did not have one cent of taxes to pay. But, as might have been expected, a revulsion came, and with the revulsion very nearly the destruction of the credit of the State. We did manage to hold it up and to work it out even through the war, for we shipped gold abroad to pay our interest during the war, running the blockade to get it out. But there was one of the greatest trials I have ever known a government to undergo.

How was the matter conducted? They passed a law there that the representatives in both houses of the Legislature might give a certificate on the back of a promissory note, made payable at the bank, limited to a certain amount of money, several thousand dollars, and that that certificate should be sufficient to make the note a proper note for discount in the bank. The result was that members of the Legislature indorsed notes in this way and gave their certificates in favor of almost any one who might call on them. The bank was flooded with notes of this kind; the State was flooded with bank money; and when they came to the proposition of redeeming any of it, the State found that the banks were all insolvent and an immense raft of bad paper had been collected in the vaults while the money went out.

There was the evil of a State government undertaking to become a director in banks and by force of legislation managing institutions of that kind, which ought to be always left to the control and management of private interests. Whenever you take a banking institution of any kind out from the control of private interest you expose it to wreck and ruin, and you make it a terrible calamity to the country. So it will be when the Government of the United States comes down to the proposition of issuing its Treasury notes from its Treasury into the hands of the people in excess of the amount required for the annual expenditures of the Government.

We can only circulate under our present heavy revenue income about $300,000,000 a year through the Treasury of the United States, and that is not quite one-third of the amount of currency actually needed for the use of the people even in their present commercial and industrial condition. So that if we resort to the project of issuing Treasury notes from the hands of Government directly into the hands of the people as they may be needed for the people of this country, we shall vainly attempt to put any restraint upon the issue of these notes that will be safe for the people of this country. I therefore believe—yes, sir, I am firm in the belief—that as a fiscal agency to stand between the Government and the people and to regulate the issue and the return, the expansion and the contraction, of the paper circulation in this country, the national banks are the best institutions which have yet been devised; and I believe that the country will suffer a great detriment the day we are compelled to give these institutions up. I am entirely satisfied, notwithstanding their enormous power of concentration, notwithstanding the limited extent of their responsibility as corporations, that we can and we will control them for the benefit of the people of this country, and so I am not alarmed about them; I am not afraid of them.

Mr. President, the point is very nearly reached, indeed I think it has now arrived, when the Senate of the United States ought to decide whether we shall sustain the national banking institutions of this country in a legitimate line of action and under proper restraints or whether we shall abandon them for some new scheme. It is postponed by this bill, but I think it is not postponed longer than until December. I believe that when we come together at the second session of this Congress we shall find a necessity immediately, urgently pressing upon us to devise some additional means of supplying the people of the United States with currency. This is a mere temporary expedient. I shall vote for it, as I said, but I shall do it understanding that it is not a cure for the evils that we now face and are about to experience.

In casting about for some other means besides the national debt as a collateral guarantee of the credit of the banks, a collateral security added to their stock, their assets, their reserves, and the responsibility of their stockholders, for the notes that the Government of the United States will issue to them, it occurred to me that the State bond would be good additional security. No Senator has yet, so far as I remember, made any statement to the contrary. They may be so entirely convinced of the contrary that they think argument is not necessary; but my poor powers of comprehension have failed to disclose to me any single substantial objection to the receipt of these bonds as a collateral security for any engagement whatever.

I can take the bonds of Pennsylvania, or Connecticut, or Massachusetts, or New York, and I can go into any of the cities of this Union—yes, into any of the banks of the country—and I can say to them, "I wish to deposit with you $100,000 of these bonds; I wish to borrow upon the faith of them $75,000 in money." Surely I can get it; there is not a bank in the country that would not like to lend a man money upon such collateral as that. If the banks can afford to do it the Government of the United States can afford to do it, for after all, repeating a remark that I made yesterday, whatever money we send into a national bank in consequence of its having deposited bonds to secure the redemption of its notes is a mere loan by the Government to the bank, secured by collateral. If the gentlemen in the Senate who are best acquainted with finance will be unable to deny that I can take $100,000 of the bonds of Pennsylvania, Connecticut, or Massachusetts, and go to any bank in New York and get $75,000 lent to me upon that as ample and sufficient collateral, then it seems to me impossible that they can deny that that is a sufficient security for the circulation of national-bank notes.

Now, let us see what such security is that you will get in hand for the redemption of the national-bank notes. It is stated by some, and I suppose upon proper authority, that there is $150,000,000 in the Treasury of the United States set apart for the redemption of what we call the greenback currency.

Mr. INGALLS. Not one dollar.

Mr. MORGAN. I said it was stated by some; I did not assume to state it as a fact, for I think that I concur in the opinion intimated by the honorable Senator from Kansas that there is not a dollar actually set apart and pledged. It is a mere fund held in the Treasury which may be reduced at pleasure, and the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] no later than yesterday introduced a bill here to provide that whatever money there might be in the Treasury of the United States in excess of $100,000,000 in coin should be paid out on the ordinary appropriations and kept paid on the ordinary appropriations whenever they were required, and prohibiting the Secretary from borrowing any money to make up a sum beyond $100,000,000; thereby putting to death, you may say, this fund for the redemption of the national-bank notes, and the greenback notes, if that is a fund for their redemption. The Senator's bill is a direct assault upon it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me for a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCPHERSON. He considers this bill to be entirely inadequate. I do not understand how under his amendment any relief will be afforded. The Senator knows that the bonds of the perfectly solvent States—I speak of those whose bonds are to-day greatly above par, who have continued to pay their interest, by whom there has been no default on the interest—to-day are in the market worth as much as the higher class of Government bonds. Now, he proposes to issue 75 per cent. circulation upon the face value of such State bonds, which he proposes to deposit in lieu of the Government bonds. How can a banking institution which refuses to take the Government bonds, four-and-a-halfs and fours, of which there are now a thousand millions out in excess of the present use by the banks, purchase State bonds at 125, deposit those bonds as the basis of banking, and receive 75 per cent. of circulation, when we propose to give them 100 per cent. of circulation on United States bonds? Then how absolutely futile the Senator's bill will be as to really solvent State bonds. Now, if his purpose be to create a market for bonds of States not absolutely solvent, who have defaulted upon their interest, that to-day are selling in the market all the way from 10 cents on the dollar up to 40 cents on the dollar, that becomes another question. I confess that under the provisions of the bill the Senator offers the market value of that class of bonds will be materially increased.

I can imagine, further, a condition of things when a party of capitalists would undertake to buy up the entire issue of bonds of the State of Virginia, if you please, use them as a basis of banking, deposit them behind circulation, secure 75 per cent. of their face in notes, that the Government itself under the bill of the Senator from Alabama is bound to redeem when those bonds are worth only about 40 per cent. That condition of things could be reached, because the capitalists of this country uniting for a given purpose can accomplish almost any result they desire.

Now, Mr. President, I will detain the Senator further only to say that under his amendment no material benefit can be reached except by a great risk.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the speech by which I have been interrupted is, I suppose, about all that can be said on that side of the subject, and I am very glad the Senator has interjected it into mine, because I shall have an opportunity to answer it now; but before doing so I will proceed a little further with the branch of the argument that I was upon, which has no relation directly to the point that the Senator makes upon my amendment. I was remarking that the Senator from Kentucky, himself a member of the Finance Committee and a man of great reputation for financial ability, had found it necessary yesterday morning to propose a bill to reduce the amount of surplus money in the Treasury of the United States, and to require that it should not be held for the redemption of greenbacks or any other obligations of the Government of the United States beyond the sum of $100,000,000, but that it might be expended for the payment of any ordinary appropriations. Here is a member of the Committee on Finance who is attacking the money basis of credit of the greenback circulation of this country, and whoever attacks the basis of the greenback circulation of this country attacks also the basis of the national-bank circulation, for when you have national-bank notes redeemed you always get them redeemed in greenbacks in the first instance. Then you take your greenbacks to the Treasury or to a subtreasury of the United States and you have them redeemed in coin. Now we have $346,000,000 of greenbacks and three hundred and fifty-odd millions of national-bank notes in circulation, for the redemption of which we are bound as a Government. The Senator from Kentucky would reduce the redemption fund to $100,000,000, that is to say, to one in seven. We have not one dollar in the Treasury of that absolutely in reserve for the purpose, but that is a general reserve fund and liable to attack, as we see, by the Senator from Kentucky and others who offer bills of that character. But we have got one dollar of coin in the Treasury of the United States to redeem seven dollars of our outstanding circulation. That is the fact. When the bill of the Senator from New Jersey passes to-day, as it will, and I mean to vote for it, we will increase the amount outstanding just 10 per cent., which will be equivalent to about forty or fifty million dollars.

Mr. PLUMB. Thirty-five million dollars.

Mr. MORGAN. Thirty-five million dollars. I stand corrected. We give to the national banks upon the collateral which they have pledged with us, our bonds, $35,000,000 without the expenditure of one additional shilling by them, without their incurring of any new obligations, without the increase of their capital stock, without any other consideration than the mere fact that they hold our bonds, which call for 100 cents in the dollar, and we issue to them 100 cents in the dollar of national-bank circulation in lieu of 90 cents on the dollar heretofore issued to them under the law.

So that the hundred million dollars in coin in the Treasury as a fund for the redemption of our paper money has got the enormous task to perform of redeeming all the greenback circulation, of redeeming all the national-bank circulation, increased by $35,000,000 by the Senator's own bill; and yet he objects that any of these banks shall be permitted to use State bonds, no matter how good they are, to secure their liability to the Government.

It occurs to me that we can strengthen the credit of the national banks, and we certainly can relieve some of the burdens of the National Government, by holding anything as collateral in addition to what we have got. I do not propose in the amendment that I offer to the bill to take away any security that stands pledged on the part of the banks for the redemption of this money. I propose to substitute a good security for that which we compel the banks to give up when we call and pay the bonds they hold.

I take the committee's bill and the existing legislation of the country precisely as it stands, and I add to it simply another feature. What is that? That in addition to the security furnished by the capital stock of the banks, and in addition to the other security to which I have referred, the banks may take good solid State bonds and pledge them as security for 75 cents on the dollar in the Treasury, and in that way and upon that basis they may get back the amount of money that we have taken from them and compel them to yield up by the compulsory redemption of their bonds.

I think the proposition that I advance must be so entirely simple that the mind of the Senator from New Jersey will not condescend to look at it. Some men love myth and elaboration, glory and grandeur, strut and pride, and they can not afford to look a common-sense proposition in the face. They must censure a thing that looks so mean as common sense does when they come in contact with it.

Mr. McPHERSON. Perhaps the Senator will condescend to answer a question for me?

Mr. MORGAN. I will after I have answered the Senator's speech, but do not propound a question to me while I am answering the speech. After I have got through with that I will answer the Senator a question.

The Senator asks, in the first place, what inducement could there be for a bank to put in bonds of a State that are worth 20 per cent. premium in the market? What inducement should there be for putting such bonds into the Treasury of the United States? My amendment, he says, is futile, because nobody will ever put in bonds of that character. It is very clear if they do not put in bonds of that sort they will not put in 4 percents, or 4½ percents, or any other percents. It will be because the business will not justify the outlay. But the States pay from 5 to 8 per cent. upon their bonds, and 4½ is the highest rate that the Government of the United States pays. The difference in the rate of interest upon the bonds is quite an inducement to their being held by banks or by bankers. It is a very much better thing to have a 5 per cent. bond than it is a 4½ per cent. bond, particularly if the 5 per cent. bond has got a long time to run. There can be no difficulty in the banks finding plenty of bonds to pledge if they really desire to increase their circulation. For, mark you, they get their interest from the States, and to that extent the people of the United States under our national laws are relieved from taxation, and it would be a favorite method, in my opinion, for the banks and bankers to support with collateral the obligations that they borrow from the Government of the United States.

But the Senator from New Jersey is afraid also that there is some proposition couched in my amendment for the purpose of putting the bonds of non-interest-paying States or States whose bonds are below par in the market into the Treasury of the United States by some finesse or fraud. He is quite mistaken about that; but if the amendment is not sufficiently guarded in that particular, no one is more capable of putting in the proper guards than the Senator from New Jersey. I disclaim any intention of that kind; but so far as I have been able to use words to express an intention in the amendment, they are quite in the other direction. I will read the third section in order (they are not numbered) of the amendment:

> That at any time that the Secretary of the Treasury shall conclude that a sale of such State bonds so deposited is necessary for the security or protection of the Government of the United States in respect of the redemption of the circulation which such bonds are deposited to secure, he shall proceed to cause said bonds to be sold, in the open market in New York, to the highest bidder for cash, and such sale shall convey a complete title to said bonds to the purchaser; but no such sale shall be made until after thirty days from the date of a notice that the Secretary of the Treasury shall give to the banking association that has deposited such State bonds, requiring such banking association to redeem said bonds by the deposit in the Treasury of the sum of lawful money of the United States equal to so much of the circulation of such banking association as such State bonds were deposited to secure.

That gives the Secretary a very broad power, a discretionary power. I remarked yesterday, and I will repeat the observation, that inasmuch as this is a tentative measure, inasmuch as I confess that this is an experiment—it has not the warrant of experience, or even of approval, so far as I know, of the people of financial reputation in this body—inasmuch as these are the characteristics of the measure which I have the honor to advocate, I propose to give the Secretary broad, large, extensive power. It may turn out that this is a good proposition; it may turn out that it will not be successful; but it is bound to turn out that it is a harmless one; there can not be any harm in it; and I have expressly provided that there shall be no harm in it, and what I have referred to is one of the provisions looking in that direction. Here is another:

> And if, after the sale of such bonds, any deficit remains in the sum required to redeem the circulation of any such banking association to the extent that the same is based upon and secured by such bonds, such banking asssociation shall pay the same into the Treasury of the United States within thirty days after it has been notified of the amount of the deficit by the Secretary of the Treasury; and failing so to pay such deficit, such banking association shall forfeit its charter, and shall be put into liquidation in accordance with the laws governing the winding up of such associations.

There is a very strong guard against fraud, or against failure, or against delinquency, or against depreciation, leaving it in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury, under rules and regulations which he may adopt, as is provided in the next section, to control the subject, so that no possible harm can come to the United States Government.

Now, what is the class of bonds that the Senator is afraid will creep into the Treasury? Let us see:

Nor shall the bonds of any State be received on deposit unless the interest theretofore accrued on the same for the period of five years previous to such deposit shall have been duly paid.

Therefore the bonds must have been in existence for five years, and it would be impossible to rush out a new issue of bonds of any State, if we have got States that would be so immoral as to do that sort of thing, for the purpose of furnishing means to the banks, and only to the banks, for doing a banking business. The interest must be paid regularly and duly for the period of five years next before the time that the bonds are deposited:

Nor shall any such bonds be so received on deposit when the same are worth less than par in the city of New York.

The interest accruing in the mean time is to be paid over to the owners of the bonds. The States pay the interest, and the Treasury of the United States becomes the vehicle, the conduit, through which this interest is transmitted to the owner of the bonds.

What next? Unless there will be a balance of some kind or other due from the bank to the Treasury, in which event this fund shall be put to the credit of that balance, we collect the money as we go along, and if we have no use for it in the liquidation of some debt that the bank owes to the Government of the United States, it is then paid into the hands of the proper owner.

It does seem to me that these guards put into the amendment are quite sufficient to answer the imaginary objections of the Senator from New Jersey. He has not even suggested anything, not to say stated anything, which throws suspicion upon this measure or which leaves it in the slightest degree doubtful that the Government of the United States can be and will be entirely protected if we shall adopt this system. Why should we not try it?

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Alabama permit me to ask him a question? I only want to understand this matter.

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. MAXEY. Suppose a State should default in its interest, as some States have done, or should repudiate its bonds, as some few others have done, what remedy does the Senator suggest?

Mr. MORGAN. My amendment provides:

That at any time that the Secretary of the Treasury shall conclude that a sale of such State bonds so deposited is necessary for the security or protection of the Government of the United States in respect of the redemption of the circulation which such bonds are deposited to secure, he shall proceed to cause said bonds to be sold, in the open market.

Mr. MAXEY. I will state the trouble in my mind with the Senator's plan, and I should like to have it explained. We have no control whatever over State legislation. We can not prevent a State from repudiating its debts, as some States have recently unfortunately done, nor can we prevent a State from defaulting in the payment of interest upon its bonds. If the debt is repudiated or if there is a default of the interest, would not the coercive power of the Government have to be brought into the State as the only remedy left? That to me is a matter of some importance.

Mr. MORGAN. We can not coerce any man, or any State either, by Congressional action to pay a debt. We can go into the judicial tribunals of the country and recover it, provided it is a private citizen we are suing. There is no such thing known to the law, however, as the coercive payment of a debt by legislative enactment. I grant you that we have no power whatever over the States to compel them to pay these bonds and none to compel them to pay interest on the bonds.

Mr. MAXEY. That is the exact trouble, if the Senator will pardon me, that I have in the matter, and I do not see where your remedy is in the case of a default.

Mr. MORGAN. As I observed yesterday, from the standpoint of the noteholder and from the standpoint of the national banks I can with equal certainty assert that they have got no power to make us pay the debt or the interest that we owe.

Mr. PLUMB. The argument of the Senator from Alabama yesterday, and a very strong one it was, too, went to show that the National Government is now responsible absolutely to the noteholder for the full payment of the notes outstanding, no matter whether the bonds realize anything or not. Would he propose to make the Government equally responsible for a note based upon State bonds?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. PLUMB. The Government becoming absolutely the guarantor.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the tenor and character of our bank notes. We have got no other kind of notes.

Mr. PLUMB. Do you propose that the General Government shall still occupy that same relation to the bonds issued by the States?

Mr. MORGAN. Of course I do.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask whether the Senator proposes that the United States Government shall guarantee the interest on the State bonds so deposited and see that it is collected?

Mr. MORGAN. The Government of the United States has nothing in the world to do with the interest except as it has to pay it over to the rightful owners of the bonds, just exactly as we collect interest through taxation and pay it to the holders of our national bonds now. But if it should turn out that while this money is passing through the Treasury which has been collected for interest the bank owes the Treasury a debt, that fund must stop there and go to the credit of that debt. That is the provision of my amendment.

Certainly the Senator from Kansas is right when he says that I assume and argue that the Government of the United States is a direct and immediate obligor upon any promissory note, whether a greenback or a national-bank note. That is so now, and it will never be otherwise. Then as to the question as to what security the noteholder has got, if I can get the Senator to consider the noteholder as a separate individual having rights, and in the case of the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas, that would be only the amount of money that we keep in reserve in the Treasury of the United States and the plighted faith and credit of this great Government; whereas if you issue circulation upon State bonds, the security that the noteholder has got is the reserve fund in the Treasury, the faith and credit of the Government of the United States, the faith and credit of the government of Pennsylvania, or whatever State whose bonds you put in, the faith and credit given by commercial men to the bonds of States by the fact that they are maintained at par in the open market in New York, and the additional pledge of 25 per cent of the face value of those bonds as a margin, for I do not propose that they shall be asked to pledge more than 75 per cent.

Mr. PLUMB. There would be one difference which seems to me a very important one between the case as it now stands and as it would stand if the Senator's amendment should prevail. The Government now does not guarantee anybody's credit except its own. Admitting that it is ultimately liable, no matter what the market value of its bonds may be at the particular time, to pay the par of its own bonds with their interest, consequently the promise which it has superadded to the noteholder makes no difference really in regard to its liability. But in the case at bar, the Senator from Alabama would make the Government the guarantor of the liability of the States of so much and so many of their bonds as might be deposited with the National Government for the security of national currency. It seems to me, if he will permit a suggestion in the way of argument, that that is a weak device. That is to say, if the Government is going to guarantee anything it had better guarantee its own credit rather than guarantee that of some State with whom it is in such a relation that it can not, according to the statement of the Senator from Alabama, operate upon it with any compulsory power whatever.

Mr. MORGAN. The suggestions made by the Senator from Kansas only reveal the necessity of having matters of this kind very well understood and very well discussed before they are passed upon. If the Senator had paid careful attention to this subject, he would have seen that the Government of the United States in no event is made a guarantor of the State bonds. I have been surprised that the Senator should have taken that view of the subject. My amendment provides that the United States Government through its Treasury Department may receive in trust, we may say, the bonds of a State at 75 cents on the dollar of their face, bonds of a certain description and secured perfectly. It holds them as collateral security for the issue which the Government makes to the banks, and in lieu of our own bonds which are paid off and upon which we authorize an issue of 100 cents in the dollar. How can it ever come, as a matter of law or matter of fact, that the Government of the United States makes any guarantee of the State bonds? It does not touch the State bonds.

Mr. COKE. Does it not guarantee the currency that is issued on the deposit of those State bonds?

Mr. MORGAN. It guarantees the currency anyhow.

Mr. COKE. Would not that be a guarantee of State bonds to the extent of the issue of currency?

Mr. MORGAN. Not by any means. If I accept a pledge from the Senator from Texas of a Texas bond for the loan of a thousand dollars, I advance him a thousand dollars upon it, but I by no means guarantee his Texas bond because I have loaned him the money upon it.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator a question? If the Government does not guarantee the State bonds, suppose the State should default in the payment of its interest on the bonds or should repudiate the bonds, would not the Government be responsible to the noteholder for every dollar of issue that had been made by the Treasury Department?

Mr. MORGAN. Unquestionably so; and the Government is responsible now to the noteholder.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely, but it is responsible on its bonds and on its own security.

Mr. MORGAN. It is responsible on its own bonds, and you are paying off the bonds and taking in the notes, and I am trying to devise some system to prevent the country from being crushed by that fact.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not making any issue with the Senator about that; I simply wanted to ascertain from him exactly what would be the practical operation of the scheme which he is suggesting.

Mr. MORGAN. I thank the Senator for his questions; they do not disturb me in the least.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me for a question?

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection. This is a good way to debate any question.

Mr. MAXEY. The national-bank paper rests upon the faith which the people have in the Government promise. The Senator says the Government of the United States would not guarantee the State bonds. What becomes then of that faith in the security of the paper issued by the Government when the Government does not indorse it?

Mr. MORGAN. The faith which is reposed is in the Government of the United States and its promise, and that is contained on the face of the ten-dollar, or twenty-dollar, or one-hundred-dollar national-bank note.

Mr. MAXEY. But the Senator says the Government does not indorse the security for the State bonds.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course I say so.

Mr. MAXEY. Then I can not see how the Government stands as security.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MORGAN. I certainly will.

Mr. HARRIS. If I understand the theory of the Senator's amendment, he proposes that bonds of a State ranking in the markets at par shall be held by the Treasury as security for the circulating notes that are to be issued to national banks?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. In the event of a State making a default the Senator proposes that the bonds shall be sold upon the market for the redemption of the outstanding circulating notes?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. Suppose they are so sold after the State has made default and they sell for less than 75 cents on the dollar, then there is a part of the circulating notes that would not be redeemed by the proceeds of that sale?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir, unquestionably.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator's amendment provide that the Government of the United States shall then redeem that balance of the unredeemed circulating notes?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. HARRIS. Then shall the Government of the United States lose the amount that it pays in the redemption of those notes or what is the remedy that the United States would have?

Mr. MORGAN. It does not provide that the Government shall lose the amount of money which it pays in excess of the amount that comes from the sale of the bonds. The Government pays of course the difference between the proceeds of the sales of the bonds and the amount of the outstanding circulation after the bonds are sold, and loses it, unless the capital stock of the bank, its assets and the individual liability of the stockholders are sufficient to make it up; but it holds to all the securities against these men under such provision of law as we have now got against men who are incorporated in national banking associations.

I will repeat my answer to the question of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY], because the question is very relevant, as well as is that put by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] very pertinent and very important.

Mr. MAXEY. I beg to say to the Senator that I had no motive on earth but to ask him in order to throw light on the subject.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course I know that; and I appreciate the question and the motive with which the Senator put it. I am glad he did it.

I will repeat what I said, if I can repeat it, about this matter. The holder of notes issued upon the faith, as we call it, of the State bonds has for his security—first, the guarantee of the Government of the United States; secondly, the amount of the reserve fund in the national bank required under the law to be kept, including the redemption fund, which is part of the reserve; thirdly, the assets of the bank, including its stock; and fourthly, the individual liability of the stockholders. The Government of the United States has got precisely the same guarantees for its reimbursement when it loses anything by this act of redemption, with the exception of course of its own guarantee of the circulating notes. That is to say, the Government of the United States has first got the bonds which are deposited as collateral security. When the bonds are sold and there is a deficit and an outstanding sum of money for which it has become liable because of its guarantee of national-bank notes issued upon the faith of it, the Government of the United States then has got the stock of the individual stockholders; it has got the individual responsibility of the stockholders, whatever that may be; it has got all the assets of the bank; it has got the reserve fund which has been held under the law just precisely as is the case now, for there is no alteration in the law in that particular; it has the power to wind up the bank, and I confide by my amendment the power in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury at any time that he may think the interest of the Government requires the sale of these bonds to sell them; so that if there is even a premonition, I will say, of insolvency on the part of the State, or any reluctance in the payment of its debt, or if they are debating the question of their liability, instantly the Secretary of the Treasury can put the bonds upon the market and sell them, so as to realize (as I think he would be apt to do upon Pennsylvania bonds or Connecticut bonds or Massachusetts bonds or Georgia bonds or Alabama bonds that were at par, the 6 percents) the 75 cents in the dollar for which we permit them to be pledged.

There is no danger in this amendment. I will remind Senators that it contains every guarantee in favor of the Government and of the noteholder which now exists, and it secures in the place of the bonds which are paid bonds of the State governments at 75 cents on the dollar, provided they are at par, and provided that the State governments for five years past paid the interest upon their bonds, thereby giving a guarantee of their good faith.

I must be allowed to say that I deprecate the suspicion which prevails against the States of the American Union throughout all the legislative circles in the land. I can not deny that there has been some cause for it in particular cases; but there is a general distrust of State securities throughout the country, and the very best of State securities are put under the ban because some of the States have not kept up with their obligations.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Alabama ought to discriminate a little. The bonds of the State of Kansas to-day are selling at about 140 in New York, when they can be bought at all.

Mr. MORGAN. I am glad to hear that Kansas has that kind of credit. It has better credit in that respect than in some other I have heard of.

Mr. BROWN. Georgia has sold many of her 4 per cent. bonds at par.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] informs me that his State sold a large batch of 4 per cent. bonds at par. The credit of States is coming up. I am glad of it. Alabama 3 percents are worth 86 and 88; our sixes are worth 104; and it has not been a long time since Alabama was involved in a great deal of trouble about her bonded debt and had a pretty severe castigation in this Chamber in respect to her bonds. The truth is, the State bonds are coming now to the front.

I will conclude what I have to say by simply remarking that in comparison between the system I propose and the system of issuing Treasury notes based upon nothing but reserves of coin in the Treasury, my plan is largely to the advantage of the people, for what I propose avails of the reserve in the Treasury for the security of the noteholder; it uses every form and fashion of security given by law to the Government for its protection, and adds to it the security of a valid and a good State bond at 75 cents on the dollar. If that is not strengthening up the security of the Government and of the bill-holder both, then I do not understand the subject at all. To my mind it is perfectly plain. I do not wonder that it has been discussed, but I wonder that Senators have not been more ready to settle the question in their minds.

I am aware of the difficulties that surround the introduction of a new proposition like this into a bill, and I think I may say that I have ventured upon this proposition with a great deal of reluctance, a great deal of concern, for it is not a pleasant matter for any man to advance a proposition merely for the sake of having it beaten down in the Senate. I prepared myself in that particular and expected defeat, for I see the Senate is not disposed to go very far in this direction, but I think most Senators are convinced that there is something in it. I have prepared myself for this result by introducing a bill this morning, and having it referred, as I observed in my opening remarks, to the Committee on Finance, and I here express the earnest desire to the gentlemen of that committee that they will look through this subject, if my amendment is not now passed by the Senate of the United States, for I believe there is a door open to us there which will furnish us relief to the extent of about $300,000,000 as a basis of banking perfectly sound and good, and one that we ought not to reject because it may be in some form or other open to conjectural suspicion.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I would not discuss the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to-day were it not for the fact that I was severely castigated yesterday by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] because I ventured to express the opinion that the amendment introduced by the Senator from Alabama was to be preferred to the measure proposed by the Senator from Kansas; and, notwithstanding his criticisms, I still maintain that opinion. Maintaining it, however, I am not obliged at this special moment to support either the measure proposed by the Senator from Alabama or the measure which was voted down yesterday.

It seems to me that our discussion is rather wide of the mark in many respects. In the first place, we do not seem to bear in mind constantly the character of this national banking system of ours. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] a few moments ago very gravely asked the Senator from Alabama what would become of the Government of the United States in case it should turn out that these State securities should be sold at 10 or 15 per cent. less than the amount of the bank circulation for which they were pledged. Aside from the question of security in the Treasury of the United States, no banking system has ever been established that is so thoroughly guarded and carefully protected with reference to its circulation as is the national banking system. This system was organized not for the purpose of kite-flying, not for the purpose of issuing the character of notes that were issued before 1861, when we had perhaps 10,000 different characters of circulation issued by thirty-four States, but it was intended to be a system whereby the capital of the country should engage in banking and engage in it in such a way as to protect the men who held the circulating notes of the banks.

I have before me the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency. That report gives a list of every bank that had been forced into liquidation since the establishment of the system in 1863. I find the aggregate capital of banks forced into liquidation during this period of twenty years to have been only $19,000,000, and of all the banks thus forced into liquidation nearly one-half or over one-third of the whole number not only redeemed their circulation through their assets, but paid to the creditors of the banks 100 per cent. So this system is well guarded in every respect without reference to the question whether the bonds held on deposit by the Government of the United States are sufficient to redeem the circulation.

Now, what is the character of some of these safeguards? In the first place every bank is prohibited from loaning money upon its own stock and upon its own circulation. It is prohibited from loaning to any one person, partnership, or corporation more than one-tenth of its capital. It is prohibited from borrowing money except on account of its circulation and its capital. These safeguards are thrown around the system and they have been added to from time to time.

Why has the Government done this? It has done it for the very reason so well stated by the Senator from Alabama, that the Government of the United States stands behind every dollar of this circulation, and justly and properly stands behind it; and whenever the Government ceases to guarantee to the holder of these circulating notes absolute payment, I for one want to see the system destroyed utterly and absolutely; first because if there is any one thing we are bound to do, having taken hold of this question, it is to see to it that the holders of circulating notes are certainly safe and secure, come what may. Therefore the only question for the Government of the United States to consider in settling this matter is what is a sufficient collateral security to be held by the Government which will enable it to recoup itself if in any event it is bound to pay these circulating notes.

Now, I repeat what I said the other day in debate, that I infinitely prefer the proposition of the Senator from Alabama to the proposition introduced by the Senator from Kansas. What is the latter proposition? I will not argue it. It is a proposition that the Government of the United States shall issue its own Treasury notes. What do they represent? They represent debt, they represent wasted energies, they represent armies destroyed, navies destroyed, expenditure wasted in every way that you please, say on rivers and harbors. If it is a wise thing to issue Treasury notes for the purpose of taking up the interest-bearing debt of the United States, why is it not an equally wise thing to issue Treasury notes for the purpose of paying the ordinary expenses of our Government and thus save pro tanto public taxation? I can see no difference in principle between the issuing of Treasury notes in payment of an existing debt, which is but substituting one promise for another promise, and issuing Treasury notes for the purpose of simply paying the ordinary expenses of our Government and repealing our tax laws.

That is the difference between these two propositions, as I understand it. But I do not favor the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. I do not favor it because I do not believe we should make so great a departure without a careful consideration of the question, not in open debate in the Senate, not by comparing views here and there as we are bound to do in discussing these questions, but the substitution of securities should be carefully considered by a committee of this body, that should look into the whole subject with care to see whether or not the proposition of the Senator from Alabama is a wise one. I do not doubt that under the safeguards thrown around his amendment there would be ample security, as suggested by him, but his measure as proposed is itself only an expedient; it, in the nature of things, is only a temporary measure. Why, sir, compared with the vast capital of the national banks, compared with the growing necessities of our country for circulation, the proposition of the Senator from Alabama is little short of a makeshift. If he will turn to the statistics with reference to our State debts, he will find that to-day they only amount to a little over $200,000,000, all told, and yet we have $201,000,000 of bonds now lying in the Treasury, to be paid presently, as security for the circulation of these national banks. Therefore, if the national banks could gather up and draw into the Treasury of the United States every dollar of State bonds that could come under the provisions of the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, it would only cover a year of the contemplated withdrawal of the 3 per cent. bonds. The New England States have but $49,000,000 of bonds outstanding, all told; the Middle States have but $44,000,000, all told; the Western States, including the State of Missouri, have but $37,000,000, all told, leaving, I believe, about $115,000,000 of State bonds in what are denominated as the Southern States; and of these $115,000,000 I submit to the Senator from Alabama that on very few of them is the interest paid. There are at least $75,000,000, if not $80,000,000, of the $115,000,000 of the bonds of the Southern States on which those States do not pretend to pay the interest, and hence they do not come within the category of his amendment. Then, if we could draw into the Treasury every dollar of the State bonds of the various Southern States of this Union that are available under the amendment, we should not get to-day, all told, bonds to the amount of $100,000,000. Virginia, Tennessee, and Louisiana, having an aggregate debt of more than $75,000,000, do not pretend to pay the interest on their bonds; and so of some of the other Southern States. I believe that Georgia and Alabama and Kentucky and Texas and some of the other States do pay their interest. I see my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] right before me; his State has only a small debt.

Mr. BECK. We have a surplus beyond the debt; so that we have no debt really. The trouble is we can not get it in.

Mr. ALLISON. She is put down in the statistical tables as having a small debt. What is true of Kentucky is measurably true of many other States. Here is the great State of New York having only $7,000,000 of public debt. Does anybody suppose that any considerable portion of the debt of the State of New York is obtainable for any purpose whatever? So of the States of New England and so of all the Middle States. Therefore the objection that I have to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Alabama is that, while it is a great departure from the settled policy of our Government and one that ought not to be considered here at all without careful examination in committee in the first place, it is no remedy for the disease which he says exists.

For myself I am glad that the Senator from Alabama has moved this amendment. It is the first proposition looking to a substitution of other securities for the securities now held by the Government on account of the national banks. It is the first opportunity we have had to discuss this question with reference to practical measures; but I submit to him that in view of the situation the remedy proposed by him is entirely inadequate. I believe—and yet I would not be bound by the opinion I express now—that we shall be compelled sooner or later to rely upon the individual liability of the stockholders of these banks for the security of the circulation by some well regulated and well guarded system. I do not believe, if we are to rely on them for circulation, that we can rest it upon any State securities or national securities that are available for the purposes of circulation. So I think the bill now before the Senate reported by the Finance Committee should be passed as it stands, leaving us an opportunity of examining in the near future (because this exigency will not come for two or three years or possibly for seven years) more carefully and considerately the question of what security we shall substitute for the benefit of the Government of the United States for the security now held by the Government.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator before he sits down why he does not rely on specie as a guarantee for the issues?

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly I do, partially.

Mr. BUTLER. That seems to be practicable.

Mr. ALLISON. We have that now as a basis for our circulation.

Mr. BUTLER. When the bonds are taken up and called in, why can not gold and silver coin or gold and silver bullion be substituted as the basis of issue?

Mr. ALLISON. That would be a very good substitute if you could secure enough of it and have people who would take stock in the banks and deposit dollar for dollar.

Mr. BUTLER. The complaint now is that there is too much silver here.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a complaint of some people and some people who do not understand thoroughly what they are talking about.

Mr. BUTLER. I am glad to hear the Senator say so.

Mr. ALLISON. I will not go into the discussion of the silver question. I know very well that at this moment we have a large amount of gold coin. The Director of the Mint tells us we have $600,000,000 of gold coin in the United States. I venture to say that that is more gold coin than is held by any other nation on earth this day. In other words, we are stronger in the basis of our circulation than any other nation is.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to put a question to him?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Does the Senator think it would be possible under the wise and conservative legislation of a great Government like this to apply the well-established principle of banking to the banks created by national authority in former days and secure the circulation? Or does he think that the notes of the national banks of the Union have any better credit than those of the Bank of England, for instance, that rest on an essentially different principle?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think so, but I do not agree with the Senator from Florida that they rest on an essentially different principle.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It will be remembered that those States of the Union that had banking systems previous to the present ones, New York and Massachusetts and those States, had wise and salutary regulations for the banks.

Mr. ALLISON. That is very true, and it is possible that a State system might be so managed now; but our national system is regarded as essential by our people for the reason that the notes are everywhere of the same value. That never was true of the State bank systems. Now our present system is substantially on the basis of the circulation of England. The circulation of England to-day is based upon the credit of the government in part, to the extent of £15,000,000. It is then based, in addition to that, upon every dollar of gold coin or bullion that is deposited in the issue department of the Bank of England. There they have a double security, partially resting upon the faith of Great Britain and partially resting upon absolute coin in the vaults of the Bank of England. That is exactly our national-bank system to-day; it is exactly the system upon which this Government has issued its circulating notes. We have $346,000,000 based upon the credit and faith of the Government. We have in addition to that whatever amount of gold and silver notes the Government chooses to issue upon deposits of gold and silver coin. Thus we have a perfectly safe system, taking the national-bank system and the Government system together, but the trouble with the national banking system is that our debt is being so rapidly paid off that this security is being swept from under our feet.

Now the problem for us to solve is what shall we substitute for this Government security? The Senator from South Carolina says gold and silver coin. In the various operations of a government or a people so widely diffused and disseminated as our people are, it would be practically impossible for us to do business on gold and silver alone.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator misunderstood me. I suggested that we make them the basis of our notes, our bank issues. I simply meant to substitute them for United States bonds.

Mr. ALLISON. The trouble with that, as the Senator will see, is that there is no inducement for capitalists to enter into a national banking system that requires them to put up a dollar in gold for every dollar of their bills.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The Senator said the security of the Bank of England note was to some extent the credit and faith of the Government of Great Britain. I do not so understand. I understand that the inducement to that great institution is afforded by the fact that absolute security of dollar for dollar lying behind the circulation is required.

Mr. ALLISON. They require security, dollar for dollar, except the amount that is held on the faith of the government, namely, £15,000,000. The Bank of England cannot issue a dollar of circulation beyond £15,000,000 unless there is a dollar of gold deposited in the vaults of the bank behind it.

Mr. BUTLER. Does not the Senator think it would be perfectly safe under the present national banking system, modified of course so as to be adapted to the obligation, to issue two for one?

Mr. ALLISON. It might be; but my own opinion is that when we authorize the national banks to issue circulation, and we ourselves as a Government hold ourselves responsible for that circulation, we ought to require the fullest and strongest security. Therefore I would require that the individual stockholders of the bank, together with the assets of the bank, should be held absolutely for the circulation to the extent of every dollar of the property of the individual stockholders. Then I would provide, in addition, that any bank might, say to the extent of one-half the capital, issue circulation upon that basis, and that upon the other half of their capital they should issue it upon the deposit of gold coin or silver coin. But this is only a speculative method of changing the whole system of our national banks. I do not know that I shall be for that after full discussion.

Mr. PLUMB. Will it interrupt the Senator if I should ask him a question?

Mr. ALLISON. No.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senator if he believes that a currency based upon individual liability would ever be accepted by the people of the United States as a currency equally good everywhere, and giving security against failures, and so on, which the currency we now have possesses.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course I can not state all the conditions of a currency in a single sentence. This currency must have, in addition to what I have stated, all the conditions which we now have, namely, absolute redeemability at the pleasure of the holder of the currency at the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. And Government inspection.

Mr. ALLISON. All the safeguards now thrown around the national-bank notes. It should have also the absolute faith of the Government behind every dollar of the circulation. With these conditions I believe a holder of a national-bank note would never inquire by what bank it was issued or make any inquiry in reference to it, and such a system would be as strong for the noteholder as our present system, and I believe it could be wisely provided that sufficient safeguards could be made for the protection of the Government against loss by means of its guarantee of the notes issued by the banks.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama presents one of the practical alternatives that Congress will be compelled to consider in connection with our banking system in the course of a very few years. At this moment, however, it is premature. It has not received due consideration, and I regret exceedingly that the Committee on Finance, instead of reporting the fragmentary and inconsequential bill that is now before us, has not risen to the dignity of the occasion and prepared some measure that will be an equivalent for the emergency with which we are shortly to be confronted, a practical solution of the problem as to what shall be the paper currency of the future.

The Senator from Iowa is always an optimist. He assures us that there is no emergency, that the days are halcyon, that the seas are undisturbed, and that years will probably elapse before there will be difficulty or disturbance with our existing banking system. When we reflect, Mr. President, that out of the $300,000,000 of 3 per cent. bonds subject to call more than $200,000,000 are held by national banks as security for their circulation, and that we have a surplus revenue ranging from fifty to one hundred million dollars per annum that can only be used for the payment of these 3 per cent. bonds, it appears to me that the Senator from Iowa is a trifle too sanguine; that we are liable at a very early period to be confronted with the difficulty resulting from the sudden, spasmodic, and dangerous contraction of the currency for which the measure reported by the committee affords no substantial remedy. When that call of bonds occurs and the circulation is contracted by 90 per cent. of the amount of 3 per cent. bonds that may be cancelled, unless I am mistaken there will be a very serious question confronting the American people.

It may, I think, be taken for granted that there is a determination that the public debt shall be paid; that there will be no consent to any abridgment of the revenue which interferes with this result; that there will be no consent to any increase of the debt, whether apparent or real, for the purpose of affording a basis for national circulation. Therefore when the Senator from Iowa says that there is no trouble, that there is no necessity for the preparation of any measure by the Committee on Finance which shall deal with this great question as to what shall be the paper currency of the future, I fear he is mistaken. And now when we are at peace, when the revenues of the country are in a satisfactory condition, when there is a surplus in the Treasury, when all of our different currencies are as good as gold, when the voice of the Greenbacker is no more heard in the land, when fiat money is no longer demanded by any considerable portion of the American people, I regret that at this most auspicious time the Committee on Finance did not conclude to report some comprehensive measure, instead of leaving the question to be considered in time of stress, of danger, and of peril, when, confronted by the dangers of a contraction of the currency, public opinion may not be as tranquil as it is at present.

Within four or five years at the outside a large proportion of the present basis of national banking will have been destroyed by the payment of the 3 per cent. bonds; I take that to be indisputable; and when that period arrives we shall be confronted with the practical question as to what shall be done to supply a currency for this country.

I said the proposition of the Senator from Alabama was one of the practical alternatives. It is. We are to consider whether this system of national banks that has proved so beneficent in its operations, that is to-day approved by all parties, is to be continued upon the basis of some other security than that afforded by the national debt. We shall then be called upon to consider whether State securities can be taken as a basis; whether mortgages upon real estate can be taken, or whether there can be any exchange of the bonds of the United States having a longer period to run, into those at a lower rate of interest which can be held by the national banks as a basis for their circulation.

I believe that Treasury notes would be the best conceivable currency provided the amount could be fixed so as not to be subject to the caprice of Congress; and I say this without concurring in the opinion that has been often expressed, that it is necessary to hold a large reserve in gold or silver coin for their redemption. I have heard the Senator from Iowa, the Senator from Alabama, and other Senators repeat during this debate the statement that there was a reserve in the Treasury at this time, in coin, held for the purpose of the redemption of the outstanding legal-tender notes of the United States. There is not one dollar in the Treasury of the United States either in gold or in silver held for that purpose, and I should be very glad if those Senators who have so often reiterated that statement would refer me either to a provision of the statutes requiring it or to a report of an officer of the Treasury affirming that a dollar is so held. There is not one single penny in the Treasury of the United States to-day held as a reserve for the redemption of the outstanding legal-tender Treasury notes of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator is it not a fact that under the resumption act of 1875, by which the power was given to authorize resumption, the bonds of the United States were sold?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. And this body of gold was bought and bought for the purposes of resumption. I do not say that there is a specific creation of a fund called a reserve fund to pay the demand notes of the Treasury, but I do say that the gold was bought for the purpose of resuming and of maintaining resumption, and therefore there is the strongest implication, if not the direct pledge of the money bought with the 4 per cent. bonds of the United States. That law, I may say, still remaining unrepealed, the power still exists to sell the bonds of the United States to any extent that may be necessary for the purpose of maintaining resumption.

Mr. INGALLS. That is true.

Mr. BAYARD. And at any rate. It is a carte blanche of power, and it is, in my judgment, that potentiality in reserve, the power in the Treasury that stands there like the Rock of Gibraltar back of the demand notes of the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Delaware and I do not disagree. There was undoubtedly, under the act of January 14, 1875, power given to the Secretary of the Treasury to "sell and dispose of, at not less than par, in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled 'An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt,' with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, to the extent necessary to carry this act into full effect."

That is absolutely unlimited, and in pursuance of that authority the Secretary of the Treasury issued and disposed of $95,500,000 of bonds, procured gold coin, placed it in the Treasury, and it is there in the general balance to-day, subject to check for daily payments, and not a dollar held for the redemption of the notes.

Mr. BAYARD. Not held as a reserve fund? It was bought for reserve.

Mr. INGALLS. There is not a dollar in the Treasury that can not be drawn out at the will of the Secretary in the payment of any of the obligations of the United States or used to-day for the purchase of the 3 per cent. bonds of the United States; and I invite any contradiction of that statement, based upon the record.

Mr. ALLISON. As the Senator from Kansas alludes to my statement in reference to the character of this reserve, he will permit me to remark that I have never stated that there was a positive and actual setting apart of so much coin in the Treasury for this particular purpose. I do not know that there is any such thing.

Mr. INGALLS. It is subject to daily check.

Mr. ALLISON. Subject to daily check; but it is not drawn upon; and no Secretary of the Treasury having regard for the implied obligations of the Government would check that balance below $100,000,000.

This is not a new discussion; we had it over and over again; and in 1882, when we passed the act rechartering the national banks, there was a provision put in the law which was intended in some degree to limit the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to draw the balance down below $100,000,000, and if the Senator will allow me I wish to read it. Section 12 of that act is the section authorizing the issuance of gold certificates. It was stated and maintained on this floor that the issuance of gold certificates would result in the withdrawal of all the greenback notes, that there would be a run upon the Treasury first, a drawing out of the gold coin for the greenbacks, and then a redepositing of the gold coin, and thus substituting gold certificates for the greenback currency. In order to avoid that objection there was put in section 12 of the law a provision:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall suspend the issue of such gold certificates whenever the amount of gold coin and gold bullion in the Treasury reserved for the redemption of United States notes falls below $100,000,000.

When the reserve held in the United States Treasury for the redemption of United States notes falls below $100,000,000! This is a clear implication that at least $100,000,000 of this sum is held for that purpose. That is all I meant to say. I never meant to say that there was a specific designation, a setting apart of so many gold dollars for the redemption of greenback notes.

Mr. BECK. As the Senator from Kansas is allowing interruptions to let gentlemen set themselves right, will he allow me two minutes to do the same thing?

Mr. INGALLS. With pleasure.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] in his argument a little while ago suggested that I was making propositions to withdraw the basis of security of the legal-tender notes of the United States by a bill that I introduced yesterday. It is pertinent to the question now up to say that I had no idea of doing any such thing. The bill is in the RECORD this morning. The bill I introduced was based upon the main idea the Senator from Kansas has, and that I agree with him in and that we have maintained together heretofore, that $100,000,000 was the maximum that the Secretary of the Treasury ought to keep in the Treasury for any purpose. He is holding now $150,000,000, and he insists upon retaining $150,000,000; and if by any casualty we should succeed in reducing our taxation down to a point where we should not be absorbing the means of the people as we are now, and make liberal appropriations in any contingency that shall happen whereby the revenues of the Government should not come up to the present standard, he would insist on selling bonds again, as Secretary SHERMAN did, to the amount of $95,000,000 to keep up his reserve.

The bill I had the honor to introduce yesterday was to the effect that if by accident, foreign complications or otherwise, the revenues of the Government fail to come up to the amount of the expenses of the Government, he should not sell any more bonds until the reserve was reduced down to $100,000,000, but that he could use that $50,000,000 of surplus above the $100,000,000. I want this to be an answer to anybody who opposes the reduction of taxation, that there is $50,000,000 of surplus to be used before he can sell more bonds.

The Senator from Kansas very well recollects the discussion that occurred here a year or two ago relative to the immense amount of money to be paid for pensions, where the Secretary wanted the power to sell more bonds; but the Senator and I and others of us said, "No; you are holding $10,000,000 now in reserve for your fractional currency; take that out;" and we succeeded in requiring him to take that out, and there never was a dollar of it used.

There is always an effort to sell bonds to keep up large balances. One hundred million dollars is the maximum, and I agree with the Senator from Iowa that it was an implication that it should not be below $100,000,000, and we never ought to have had it beyond that. Therefore I desired the Senator from Kansas to draw that down and make it imperative on the Secretary not to sell any more of our bonds where he has any sum in excess of $100,000,000 lying in the Treasury, but to use it as money in the Treasury appropriated instead of selling bonds to meet any deficit that may occur in the revenues if they do not come up to the expenditures.

I thank the Senator from Kansas for allowing me to say this much.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I do not learn that any of the observations which have been made impair in any degree the force of the remark which I submitted that there is not at this time a dollar in gold or silver coin in the Treasury of the United States held as a reserve for the purpose of redeeming the legal-tender Treasury notes; and if any Senator can point me to any clause in the statutes or to a report of any of the officers of the Treasury which either commands that or shows that it exists, I shall be instructed. I make this observation, not for the purpose of intimating that any obligation of law has been disregarded, not to show that there ought to be or ought not to be a coin reserve in the Treasury, but to show that the value of these legal-tenders does not depend upon a redemption fund; that they would be exactly as good as they are now if there was not a dollar of this idle coin in the Treasury; because, as the Senator from Delaware has already pointed out, in the act of January 14, 1875, the absolute power was given the Secretary of the Treasury at any time to sell a sufficient amount of the interest-bearing bonds of the United States to make redemption secure. That is all the power required to made the legal-tender notes good; and it is not necessary, in my judgment, that one farthing of this vast coin reserve, now amounting to about $150,000,000, should be held longer so far as the value of the legal-tender Treasury notes is concerned.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Kansas permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator a moment ago was discussing the proposition that very soon as the national bonds are paid off we must make provision for currency, and he expressed the opinion, in which I concur, that Treasury notes are as good a currency as can possibly be made; but he suggested danger from improvident legislation. I ask if the convertibility of the Treasury notes into coin on demand does not prevent an overretention in circulation of Treasury notes, on the ground that when there is too much of them the holder of the note will go to the Treasury and get his coin for it. That is, the very fact of convertibility prevents the keeping out of more of that circulation than the demands of commerce require.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator is right. All those difficulties, under the condition that he suggests, would adjust themselves.

It may be instructive, Mr. President, to consider for a few moments the annual report of the Treasurer of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883. Upon page 9, where the subject of the reserve is considered, he says:

The following statement shows the excess of the cash assets of the Government over its net demand liabilities on the 1st day of November, 1883, compared with that on the same date in 1882:

Reserve—excess of assets	135,151,688 99	160,822,545 42

It will be seen that the reserve—

Mark his language—

the reserve is ascertained by deducting from the cash in the Treasury the aggregate of the current liabilities other than United States notes, the amounts of certificates and other obligations nominally outstanding having been first reduced by the amounts of those held by the Treasury.

The reserve increased from $135,151,688.99 in 1882 to $160,822,545.42, due to the increase in the cash owned by the Government of $8,918,286.36 in gold coin and bullion, $4,831,403.59 in silver dollars and bullion, and $4,771,969.57 in currency; and to the decrease in the liabilities for bonds and interest of $9,486,490.52, and in the funds for redemption of national-bank notes of $2,747,564.70. This aggregate increase of $30,755,714.74 is, however, reduced to $25,670,856.43 by the increase in the liabilities on account of Post-Office Department, outstanding drafts and checks and disbursing officers' balances of $4,297,020.12, and by an actual decrease in the fractional silver coin in the Treasury and the funds on deposit with national-bank depositories of $787,838.19.

The amount of the reserve a year ago would, however, have appeared greater by $12,063,714.72 had not payment been anticipated of that amount of called bonds not then matured, which should be considered in making any comparison.

The following table shows for the first day of each of the past thirteen months the amount of the current liabilities exclusive of United States notes; the amount including such notes; and the cash in the Treasury, certificates for gold, silver, and currency deposits and the moneys held for the redemption of the same, having been deducted; also the percentage of the reserve ascertained, as stated above, to the United States notes outstanding, and of the cash to current liabilities, including those notes.

Month.	Current liabilities, excluding United States notes and coin and currency certificates.	Current liabilities, excluding certificates and including United States notes, namely, $346,681,016. Average for fifty-nine months	98,059,296 47	444,740,312 47	233,424,407 81	39.0	52.5

The range of the percentage of the reserve to the amount of United States notes outstanding ($346,681,016) during the period was from 32.2 per cent. in January to 46.4 per cent. in November, 1883; and the average for the four years and eleven months since the resumption of specie payments was 39 per cent.

Upon the assumption that the percentage should be computed between the cash in the Treasury and the liabilities, including United States notes, all certificates and the moneys for their redemption being excluded, the range was from 48.8 per cent. to 58.2 per cent. during the thirteen months, and averaged 52.5 per cent. for the fifty-nine months since resumption.

And yet Senators gravely assert that this is a reserve held for the purposes of redemption; that the shifting sands of a daily balance, struck by the officers of the Treasury, ranging from 32 per cent. of the outstanding United States notes in one month to 58 per cent. in another in the same year, subject at every moment to be drawn upon for the current obligations of the Government, subject to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, is a reserve held for the purposes of redemption!

Mr. President, if after reading this statement of the Treasurer any Senator feels disposed to say that even the $95,500,000 secured by the sale of bonds is held as a reserve, I shall certainly be very much gratified. There is not one dollar that can not be paid out to-morrow for the purchase of 3 per cent. bonds; that power has been given to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Senator from Iowa in his speech spoke of that as being one of the safeguards against the dangers of contraction.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the Senator to say that no Secretary of the Treasury had ever reported that there was any sum in the Treasury held for the redemption of United States notes. Was I correct in that understanding?

Mr. INGALLS. That is my belief.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will read only one instance of several which I am sure exist from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in 1880. The then Secretary of the Treasury now holding a seat on this floor, the honorable Senator from Ohio, said in his report:

The general available balance is now treated as such a fund, but, as this balance may, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury—

Precisely as the Senator from Kansas has said—

be unduly drawn upon for the purchase or payment of bonds, it would appear advisable that Congress prescribe the maximum and minimum of the fund.

Thus stating in terms that the available balance is used and is held by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of redemption and suggesting the fixing of a limit. I do not contend, nor has any Secretary of the Treasury nor any one on this floor ever contended within my knowledge, that this fund is specifically set apart either in the Treasury or under the provisions of any statute for this purpose; but it has been held, within the knowledge of Congress and within the knowledge of the people of this country, by the Secretary of the Treasury to be an available balance ranging, as has been shown, from 32 per cent. to 40 per cent. from time to time for this purpose. The amount never has been below $95,500,000. At no time since these bonds alluded to were sold has the amount of gold coin in the Treasury ever been as low as the sum which he has named, and two Secretaries of the Treasury at least have called the attention of Congress to the reserve so held, not by express command of law perhaps, but in the discretion of the Secretary, for the purposes of redemption of the United States notes outstanding.

I differ entirely with the Senator from Kansas in his idea that the value of these notes is not sustained to a very great extent by the amount of this fund.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator, as I yielded to him, oblige me by submitting to an interrogation?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. Will he inform me if in his opinion there is a dollar of the coin balance in the Treasury that the Secretary of the Treasury cannot, if he sees fit, to-day or Monday employ in the purchase of 3 per cent. bonds?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think there is not.

Mr. INGALLS. Exactly what I said.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not by express limitation of law.

Mr. INGALLS. Then upon what does it stand?

Mr. ALDRICH. Upon the wise discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury and upon the unwritten law which should govern him in matters of this kind.

Mr. INGALLS. What would be said about the coin reserve in a State bank that rested on the wise discretion of the board of directors? That is what the Senator from Rhode Island replies to me in regard to the coin reserve in the Treasury; it depends upon the wise discretion of the Secretary, says the Senator, and yet if any bank in Rhode Island required to hold a coin reserve for the redemption of its circulating notes should announce that its sole dependence was upon its daily balance of deposits, subject to the will of its president or board of directors, I am inclined to think public confidence in its solvency would be materially impaired.

Mr. ALDRICH. The fact that such a condition of affairs exists is the fault of Congress. I have read from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of 1880 suggesting that a maximum and minimum be fixed for this fund. No such maximum or minimum has been fixed except by a limitation in the national banking act of 1882, which has been read, put there on my motion, and made mandatory upon the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas himself, providing, at least by implication, the amount of coin reserve should never go below $100,000,000. I will admit that is only by implication, but the plain inference is that the Secretary is bound to maintain an amount not less than $100,000,000 of coin for redemption purposes.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator will pardon me a word, as the subject is very interesting, I think, to the public. I would say the matter is much stronger than a mere implication.

Mr. INGALLS. Will not the Senator point out why?

Mr. BAYARD. I will tell you why.

Mr. INGALLS. I should be glad also if he would point out where the implication is.

Mr. BAYARD. I think it is something stronger than an implication. The Government of the United States had a large body of its demand notes outstanding and unpaid. They resolved under the forms of law to resume specie payments, and in order to resume specie payments they authorized the sale of the interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the purpose of creating that which would enable them to resume.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator allow me to say that they authorized more than that?

Mr. BAYARD. They certainly authorized that. Then they authorized the sale of the interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the purpose of providing a fund in gold that should meet the demand notes of the United States and assist in resumption. But not only that, it went further—I do not think I can be mistaken about this—they went further, and gave the power to sell bonds without limit in order that not only should specie payments be resumed, but that they should be permanently maintained.

I objected to a construction of that resumption act, because when I asked the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] whether he held that they could reissue notes of the United States which once had been paid he refused to give any interpretation to it, and so I never did regard that redemption act as an honest one upon its face or a finality, because it provided for the reissue of those notes which had once been paid, which was resumption, and then again going in debt further.

I had but one idea, that the Government meant to pay its notes, and be done with them. That was my theory and my wish, and in order to do that they sold their bonds and bought $100,000,000 of gold. What was it bought for? Certainly to pay such notes as should be offered at the Treasury for redemption. The consequence was that the public, knowing that nothing is so convenient or valuable as a note convertible at will into gold, did not present the notes, and the reserve never was called for. The reason they did not is obvious. It was certain to be accomplished whenever the notes went there, because not only was there the $100,000,000 to begin the resumption, but the unlimited power of the Government to sell its bonds to continue it and maintain it.

Although I agree that there is not a direct stipulation and contract that this money should be used for one purpose and one purpose only and kept there for that one purpose and that one purpose only, yet there is no other fair and reasonable construction; so much so, that if it were a case between private individuals I believe any court of chancery would restrain the use of one dollar of that money for any other purpose than the protection and redemption of these demand notes. It is stronger than an implication. It is not, as my friend from Rhode Island said, an unwritten law, it is a written law, and there lies in that law such an obligation that I believe that if it were a case between private parties and the matter was brought into a court of chancery the chancellor would restrain the payment or the use of that gold fund for any other purpose than that for which it was expressly designed.

I do not believe that the Secretary of the Treasury has in law the right to buy 3 per cent. bonds with that gold fund. I think there is no reasonable construction of the law that looks to that. You may say there is no letter of the law to restrain him. I say there is the spirit and there is the fair construction of the law; that it would be a perversion of his powers, and not only a perversion of his powers, it would be a perversion of the law and an assumption of unjust power if he took one dollar of that gold coin to pay it off for the ordinary expenses of the United States. That is what I mean to say, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, we are at last enlightened. One Senator tells us that this reserve rests upon an implication; another Senator assures us that it is based upon a fair and reasonable construction of an unwritten law; and a third that if the Secretary of the Treasury should venture to use one dollar of this fund for any other purpose than the redemption of the legal-tender notes he could be restrained by proceedings in chancery.

Mr. BAYARD. I said if it was a case between private individuals.

Mr. INGALLS. I understood that. But it is obvious from what has been admitted that the wildest claimant for strict construction can not find in the statutes or in the reports of the Secretary any foundation on which to base the assumption that any coin in the Treasury is held as a fund for the redemption of notes; and for the purpose of pointing the moral and adorning the tale, if the Senator from Iowa will restrain his impetuosity for a moment, I will call his attention to the language of the statute providing for resumption.

Mr. ALLISON. That is just what I desire the Senator to do.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator from Delaware give me his attention while I read the language of the statute?

Mr. BAYARD. The law of 1875?

Mr. INGALLS. January 14, 1875.

And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem, in coin, the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding, on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York in sums of not less than $50. And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption in this act authorized or required, he is authorized to use any surplus revenues from time to time in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par, in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, to the extent necessary to carry this act into full effect, and to use the proceeds thereof for the purposes aforesaid.

Now that there is, by implication even, in the language of that statute any direction to the Secretary to provide a specific fund for the redemption of the aggregate amount of legal-tender notes outstanding——

Mr. BAYARD. Was it not to enable him to do this thing that the law was given?

Mr. INGALLS. Whenever they might be presented in sums of $50; but the claim that he was by the language of the statute directed to provide a fund that should be a specific reserve for that purpose is absolutely untenable. How much was he to provide? What per cent. of the outstanding amount of legal-tender notes was he to place in the Treasury.

Mr. BAYARD. Will not the Senator admit that whatever he did procure was dedicated to that purpose?

Mr. INGALLS. But every cent that he did provide has been confused and mixed and confounded with the other assets in the Treasury, until there is not a dollar that can be distinguished. It is absolutely inseparable, and has been so from the hour that $95,500,000 of bonds was sold down "to the latest syllable of recorded time;" and of the aggregate balance that remains after deducting liabilities from assets, shifting all the way, by implication or by fair and reasonable construction or by a wise discretion, from ninety-five millions to one hundred and sixty millions, there is not a dollar that can not be expended to-day in the purchase of 3 per cent. bonds.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will read for the edification of the Senator from Kansas from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the year 1882:

The policy of the Department has been to keep for the redemption of the United States notes a reserve of about 40 per cent. of the amount of them outstanding—

Mr. INGALLS. "About 40 per cent."

and, besides that, to hold money enough to meet all other obligations payable on demand.

The fact is that the Secretaries of the Treasury have held continually a sum, treated as a reserve, equal to about 40 per cent., as this Secretary states, of the amount of outstanding United States notes, in addition to the amount necessary to meet the current demands of the Treasurer; and that fact has been repeatedly announced to Congress, and Congress by their non-action in the premises have given their acquiescence, their assent, I think I may fairly say their approval, to the policy thus adopted. The amount, as shown by the statement of the Treasurer read by the Senator himself, has never fallen below 32 per cent. on the amount of outstanding notes in addition to the amount necessary to meet all the other obligations of the Treasury.

Mr. INGALLS. I suppose then the Senator calls 32 per cent. "about 40!" He declares that the intention of the Secretaries of the Treasury has been, as announced in their reports, to hold "about 40 per cent." That is much like the promissory note of our African fellow-citizen who said, "For value received I promise to pay two or three dollars in two or three days." This policy of holding about 40 per cent. depends not upon the will of Congress, but upon the sound judgment and discretion of the Secretary; and yet I show by the report of the Treasurer for the last fiscal year that during the period of thirteen months last preceding it has descended as low as 32 per cent. and has ascended as high as 58.2 per cent.; and still we are gravely told that the value of the Treasury notes depends upon the coin reserve held in the Treasury.

Mr. ALLISON. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. INGALLS. I never listen to the Senator from Iowa without instruction and pleasure.

Mr. ALLISON. Thank you. Now I desire the Senator's construction of this statute. It seems that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell United States bonds "to the extent necessary to carry this act into full effect." That is what he can do. He can sell United States bonds to the extent necessary to carry the act into full effect.

Mr. INGALLS. If he were to hold it necessary to have a dollar in gold behind every dollar in legal-tender notes, he has the authority to sell sufficient bonds to make that amount.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. INGALLS. Unquestionably he has.

Mr. ALLISON. Now further:

And to use the proceeds thereof for the purposes aforesaid.

Now, what I want to ask the Senator from Kansas is this: Where, by statute or by agreement or by deed or by any instrument, we authorize an officer or person to do a particular thing with a sum of money or property that we intrust to him, is he authorized to do what he pleases with it or is he confined necessarily to the terms of the trust?

Mr. INGALLS. He has done as he pleased with it.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not so understand.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish the Senator from Iowa would point out to me somewhere on the statement of the Treasurer of the United States a dollar that is declared to be held in reserve for the redemption of United States notes. Here is his report.

Mr. ALLISON. I thank the Senator for handing me this book. This book describes with distinctness and clearness that there is a reserve.

Mr. INGALLS. Where?

Mr. ALLISON. In the Treasury; a reserve. He calls it a reserve—for what? That reserve is there for two purposes: first, to pay whatever current obligations may come in from time to time——

Mr. INGALLS. Suppose the current obligations exceed the entire amount of cash in the Treasury?

Mr. ALLISON. If they do, as a matter of course the Treasury would practically go to protest.

Mr. INGALLS. Then the reserve vanishes?

Mr. ALLISON. To that extent. Now the remainder is held as a matter of course.

Mr. INGALLS. If it is all paid out on current obligations, what part is reserved?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Kansas of course can catechise me very well upon this point. If it should so happen that the amount of current obligations should exceed the amount of money in the Treasury, the Government would go to protest.

Mr. INGALLS. No; the Secretary would sell bonds.

Mr. ALLISON. He can not sell bonds for any other purpose except to redeem the Treasury notes. That power is only for that purpose. We imposed upon the Secretary of the Treasury the duty of selling bonds to the extent necessary to carry this law into effect. He sold bonds to the extent of $95,500,000; and what I claim is—if the Senator from Kansas differs with me I hope he will say so—that here is a legitimate, specific command to use that $95,500,000 for one purpose. Now, I say if the Secretary of the Treasury uses it for another purpose he violates the provisions of the statute.

Mr. INGALLS. He has used it for another purpose. When the bonds were sold the money received was paid into the general Treasury and has there remained, subject to draft for current obligations ever since; and if the Senator from Iowa can point to me, on this statement of the assets and liabilities of the Treasury, any item which shows that there is a dollar of that $95,500,000 not subject to draft, then I will admit that I am mistaken; but until then I will not.

Mr. MILLER, of California. They have "mixed" the funds.

Mr. INGALLS. Of course they have been mixed. The proceeds of the bonds were put into the general fund the moment the money was received, and they have been subject to daily draft ever since.

If as the Senator from Iowa says these bonds were sold to create a fund for redemption purposes, what should have been done? What would a bank do, organized under State law, authorized to hold a coin reserve of 25 or 30 per cent. of its circulating notes? Would the Senator from Iowa say it was a compliance with the law to put the reserve in their vaults, to be drawn upon daily for the payment of checks or outstanding obligations? Is that a coin reserve held for the redemption of notes? It is idle to talk about it. No one who has examined this matter can fail to perceive that if the proceeds of the sale of the $95,500,000 of bonds was to constitute a redemption fund, it should have been placed in the vaults of the Treasury and accounted for as such and held as sacredly as a special deposit made by an individual subject to be returned in kind.

The fact that it has been put into the general fund, its identity absolutely destroyed, included in the balance that may be struck in the daily transactions of the Treasurer, shows that coin redemption plays small part in the value of the Treasury notes of the United States. It is in the ability of the Government to redeem that their value consists. The power is in the section of the statute which says that whenever it is necessary the Secretary may sell bonds for the purpose of producing a redemption fund. Therefore it is that I contend, and shall always contend, that if the Treasury notes of the United States could be issued in sufficient volume for the requirements of the business of the country, freed from the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, freed from the liability to increase or diminution at the will of Congress, so as to form a stable and permanent amount of currency convertible at pleasure of the holder, they would be the best circulating medium that could be devised.

Mr. President, this debate has taken a wide range, and I return to my first expression of regret, that in this time of peace and prosperity the Committee on Finance had not thought best to report some general measure that would give us some relief in the emergency that is shortly to arise, and that is the destruction of the present national-bank system by the payment of the bonds.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator permit me for a moment?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator has for a second time referred to the Committee on Finance as being derelict in their duty for not reporting a bill that would be more far-reaching in the present emergency to supply the place of the withdrawal of the national-bank notes. I wish to say that this measure was reported in consequence of the payment by the Government of about ten or twelve million dollars per month of the 3 per cent. bonds, more than half of which were found to be deposited for the circulation of the national banks; and it was thought that this for the time would be something of a relief. But I will add that there is a measure before the Committee on Finance that may have consideration at an early day of a more far-reaching character than the present bill, and I hope it will receive the favor of the committee, so that it can be reported; but I doubt whether when reported it will quite satisfy the Senator from Kansas, who opened his speech with the remark that the voice of the Greenbacker and fiat-money man was no longer heard in the land, and yet proceeded at once to avow his idea that a Treasury note, without any reserve fund behind it, was the very best possible solution of the question before us. I think that none of the rest can now say that the voice of the Greenbacker and fiat-money, maker is no longer heard in the land.

Mr. INGALLS. Why, Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont misstates my position. His remark is like one of the counterfeits of his own national-bank notes, "well calculated to deceive." I said expressly that in my judgment Treasury notes of the United States, protected from the discretion of the Secretary and guarded against the danger of undue and hasty expansion or contraction by Congress, so that the amount could be stable, convertible, and permanent, would be the best currency that could be devised; and if the Senator from Vermont thinks that is fiat money, then I welcome him to his conceit.

Mr. MORRILL. I have always understood that money issued by the Government without any coin behind it was distinctly fiat money and nothing else.

Mr. INGALLS. There is not a dollar behind the notes now issued by the Government, as I have shown, and the Senator from Vermont will oblige me if he will show me the contrary.

Mr. MORRILL. I think there is $150,000,000.

Mr. INGALLS. Not $150,000,000, and not one dollar, and it has been conclusively shown that there was no fund required in the first place, and that no fund has been maintained; and in the next place, that the money that was obtained by the sale of bonds under the act of January 14, 1875, was immediately mingled with the funds in the Treasury, and never has been heard of since as a reserve fund.

Mr. MORRILL. But if the Senator from Kansas was the trustee of any fund and should deposit that in a bank with his other bank money, could it be said that, so long as he had twice or thrice the amount in bank to cover any demand that might be made upon him as trustee, there was nothing behind to support any draft upon the trustee account?

Mr. INGALLS. Would the Senator say that in the case of a State bank required by State law to keep from 25 to 33⅓ per cent. of its circulation in gold coin, the action of the directors saying they would keep as much as they pleased was a compliance with that law?

Mr. MORRILL. That does not answer the question I proposed.

Mr. INGALLS. It is a parallel statement in regard to the present condition of the Treasury so far as the redemption of the legal-tender notes of the United States is concerned.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. If a bank was required by law to keep one-fourth of its outstanding circulation in gold coin as a reserve fund, would it make any difference if they kept the coin, whatever the account might be called under which it was held where it was held as a specific account, as a redemption fund, so long as they held the coin required by law and the amount never was below the amount provided by law? Would it make any difference to the solvency of the bank or to its compliance with the law what its system of book-keeping was, under what heading in the accounts of the bank the fund was held?

Mr. INGALLS. What is the amount required by law to be kept in the Treasury of the United States for the redemption of legal-tender notes?

Mr. ALDRICH. Ninety-five million five hundred thousand dollars at least, according to my understanding of the law.

Mr. INGALLS. Where do you find it stated at that?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is stated in the law read by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. INGALLS. I hope the Senator will read it.

Mr. ALDRICH. It has been read.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator will oblige me by reading it again.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator want the whole of it read?

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir; I want the clause read on which the Senator relies for his statement that $95,500,000 are held in the Treasury as a fund for the redemption of United States notes.

Mr. ALDRICH. The law is as follows:

> And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption in this act authorized or required, he is authorized to use any surplus revenues from time to time in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par, in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled," &c.

He is authorized for certain specific purposes named in this act to sell such bonds. In accordance with this authority he did sell bonds to the amount of $95,500,000, for what? For the purposes named in this act specifically, and that amount of coin has been held in the Treasury ever since—not the specific dollars which the Secretary then bought, but the reserve in the Treasury has never fallen one single dollar, from that time to this, below the sum of $95,500,000; and I challenge the Senator to find to-day from any report of a Secretary of the Treasury a statement that the reserve was below that.

Mr. INGALLS. There is no day when it may not be reduced below that sum.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not if the Secretary carries out the pledged faith of the Government and obeys the plain instructions of the law.

Mr. INGALLS. That satisfies the Senator from Rhode Island, and I ought not to complain. If he thinks that is a requirement that the Secretary of the Treasury shall keep just $95,500,000 in the Treasury as a reserve fund, then he is very easily satisfied.

To return once more and finally to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Alabama, which is now before the Senate for its action. I said that it was one of the practical alternatives that would soon be presented for consideration in determining what should be done to provide a national currency. I regret that he has brought it before the Senate thus prematurely, because, though very important, it has not received such consideration as will enable us to vote upon it intelligently.

Aside from the issue of Treasury notes and the substitution of other than national securities as a basis for circulation there are but two alternatives remaining for consideration. One is the return to the old system of State banks, with its attendant inconvenience and insecurity. After the experience of the past twenty years with a currency national, convertible, safe, it is not likely that this plan will ever be received with favor.

The last alternative is a great central fiscal institution, corresponding somewhat to the Bank of England in its functions; like that established under the scheme of Hamilton in 1791, continued for twenty years, renewed in 1816 for another term of twenty years, and finally overthrown by the apostacy of John Tyler after the political revolution of 1840.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has just assured us that by the process of the extinction of the national debt some $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 per month of 3 per cent. bonds are being paid, of which a large amount is held by the national banks as security for their circulation. That is not less than $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 per year. He states as the result of the deliberations and the lucubrations of the Finance Committee that they regard this measure which they have reported as a remedial measure for the difficulty from that contraction. By the admission of those who support this bill as a remedial measure all that it can possibly do is to add 10 per cent., which is between $34,000,000 and $35,000,000, to the amount of national-bank note currency authorized to be outstanding as against the contraction of $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 which may occur within a single year, and that the Senator regards as a measure that is equal to the emergency that is at hand.

Mr. MORRILL. I did not say that.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator says he did not say it. I should like to hear what he did say.

Mr. MORRILL. I said for the time being.

Mr. INGALLS. That is, until $35,000,000 are retired this bill will be an equivalent, but as soon as $35,000,000 or $36,000,000 have been retired then the process of contraction goes on with constant acceleration, until in some crisis of distrust, of danger, some unexpected moment when extravagant credits given by banks have shaken confidence, or floods or droughts have destroyed the harvests and an unusual demand for money occurs, this sudden contraction will precipitate another convulsion like that which occurred in 1873, and we shall then again be met by the same perils that then nearly destroyed the whole fabric of our national prosperity.

Mr. President, I shall very cordially support the measure that has been reported by the committee, because there can be no objection to it; but I still adhere to the expression of regret that in view of the imminent needs of the country the committee have not thought fit to present some broad, general measure that shall deal with the great question as to what is to be the paper currency of the future.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, no debate has occurred for a long time that has gratified me so much as the debate this afternoon, for the reason that the attention of the Senate has been called more sharply than I have ever been able to call it to the wrongs that have been going on for years growing out of the discretion allowed to heads of Departments, instead of requiring them to obey positive law.

I have, time and again, in season and out of season, until perhaps I have somewhat wearied the Senate by doing so, shown that the Secretary of the Treasury is the autocrat of this Government, and that in his dealings with the immense sums placed in his hands he is the master of Congress instead of being its servant. He usurps or assumes the legislative authority of the country, instead of being, as he is by law, a subordinate officer of the executive.

Twice since this Congress met I have proved in regard to his treatment of the surplus revenue which he calls the sinking fund, which we know and which he admits has been provided for by about five hundred and odd million dollars in excess of what the law required, that he can to-day, with $100,000,000 of annual surplus in his hands, when the sinking fund requires the payment according to his construction of $50,000,000 annually, buy bonds with the whole $100,000,000 on the last day of the fiscal year, the 30th day of June, and tell Congress, "You must levy taxes, $50,000,000 in excess of what Congress thinks necessary for the support of the Government, in order to pay to that sinking fund $50,000,000 the next year," whereas if he had paid $50,000,000 on the 30th day of June and $50,000,000 on the 1st day of July, that being the first day of the next fiscal year, we would have paid the sum due to the sinking fund for both years. That discretion he is claiming now and that discretion he is now exercising, and Congress stands apparently powerless, being compelled, according to his construction and the construction other distinguished gentlemen are endeavoring to maintain, to pay the sinking fund every year, to make our taxes $50,000,000, more or less, as the Secretary sees fit to pay out the people's money on one day or another. He is to-day receiving greenbacks at the custom-house, and has been for years, in payment of customs dues, although the statutes of the United States provide—and this is the very statute that our leading financiers claim is the solemn pledge of the nation, that we will all be ruined in the estimation of our creditors and the world if we violate for a moment in any regard—that the customs dues shall be paid in coin and nothing but coin.

SEC. 3694. The coin paid for duties on imported goods shall be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows:

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Second. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund.

It is asserted that we will violate our pledged faith if we vary the least iota from paying this sinking fund annually, though it has never been so paid, and no account of it was even kept till 1870; yet the Secretary of the Treasury, in plain violation of that statute, is receiving the legal-tender notes at the custom-house in payment of customs dues, and has done so since 1879, and he has always refused, as he has said in reports that were laid before the Senate in response to resolutions offered by me, to pay the coin received at the custom-house when that coin was silver coin to the bondholders of the United States, though the law requires him to do so. They do not want silver, he says, and therefore h will not ask them to take it, although the law requires him to pay that coin, when received for customs, upon the interest of the public debt.

Secretary Sherman, I repeat, in answer to a resolution of mine as to why he did not pay the interest in silver received at the custom-house, said that the bondholders did not want it. They stickle for a strict observance of law and pledges when it suits them and pay no attention to either when it does not. I have always believed that legal-tender notes should be received at our custom-houses by law; therefore I introduced a bill, and had it referred to the Finance Committee, providing that legal-tender notes of the United States should be received at the custom-house; the Finance Committee have reported it back adversely, and it, with the adverse report, is now on the Calendar. I insisted that it should not be indefinitely postponed; I insist that the Secretary of the Treasury shall not violate the law; that Congress ought either make it legal to receive greenbacks at the custom-houses or should by law prohibit the Secretary from receiving them; that no such discretion ought to exist in any Secretary. I shall test the sense of the Senate on that proposition notwithstanding the adverse report of the Finance Committee. As I said, he is regarded as being above the law in regard to our customs and our sinking funds. He now claims that he may receive our legal-tenders if he pleases and not receive them if he chooses not to. He is of course sustained by the Finance Committee in their adverse report, which recognizes it as legal for him to do what he is doing, though each member well knows that what he is doing is in plain violation of law. If that is not transferring the law-making power to the executive officials, and abandoning the power of Congress as the legislative power, I do not know what it is.

It has been further asserted in this debate that the Secretary of the Treasury, having authority to sell any bonds of the United States that he thought necessary in order to maintain resumption, having seen fit to sell $95,500,000 of them and obtained gold which he deposited in the Treasury, therefore it is strictly a reserve fund because he has the money there. He had the authority to sell a thousand millions. If he had done it, that amount, I presume, would be called a reserve fund under the law, since the discretion of a Secretary seems to be above law. I introduced a bill a day or two ago, and had it referred to the Committee on Finance, which reads thus:

That if at any time the revenues of the Government shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations made by Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to use so much of the cash balance remaining in the Treasury as may be necessary to make up the deficit, as though it was money not otherwise appropriated; and he is further directed not to issue or sell bonds of the United States in order to obtain money to make up such deficit until the cash balance in the Treasury is reduced below $100,000,000.

I expect an adverse report from that same wise committee against that measure, because it will be interfering with the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. If we are willing to allow him to retain $100,000,000 as the minimum, he should not be allowed to sell bonds of the United States at any price that he sees fit so long as he has that $100,000,000 in the Treasury. If we fix the minimum, the use to which all above that shall be put ought to be with Congress and not with the Secretary. When the resumption act was passed every man in both Houses of Congress and every man in the country knew the very moment we said the silver coin of the country shall be equal in its uses to gold, that it shall be received at the custom-house, that it shall be a legal tender for all debts, and when we again coined the silver dollar, from that moment the demand for gold, so as to cause a run on the Treasury or a panic, became impossible, and the very moment the Secretary said that he would receive the greenbacks at the custom-house, that moment they not only became as good as gold, but were at one-fourth of 1 per cent. premium in ten days afterward. Yet we are to be prohibited by law from allowing the greenback to occupy that position; it is to be equal to gold or not only in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury; if he changes his mind in regard to these notes the solemn pledge of the act of 1862 will be again brought to the front after being so long disregarded. If legal-tenders had been received for customs five years before they were they would have been equal to gold then, and all pretense for buying $100,000,000 of gold would have been removed.

Resumption was made possible, first, by the recoining of the silver dollar and making it a legal tender for all purposes. Under the law the Secretary of the Treasury was required to pay all silver coin received at the custom-house which he was obliged to take from those who imported goods to the bondholders of the United States in payment of their interest. He never paid a dollar of it to them, and defiantly told us that he would not do it, because they did not want it. When he saw that he could no longer keep the greenbacks at a discount, and that the day of resumption was at hand, he said, "Take them at the custom-house," and they went to the custom-house. After that it never was necessary to hold a dollar of gold to make them good. The use of them for customs made them good. If he had treated the silver coin as our trustee and paid it to the bondholders that would have kept it in circulation. If he had said two or five years before what he said on the 1st day of January, 1879, "Take the legal-tenders at the custom-house," he never would have had an excuse for the purchase of one dollar of the $95,500,000 of gold that he bought and has kept lying idle in the Treasury ever since, with $50,000,000 now added.

I said I was glad that this discussion had sprung up, because this Congress must take control of its own affairs, and the direction must be placed with it and not left in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, where the Finance Committee and Congress have so long consented that it should remain.

I referred a little while ago to the debate we had a year or two since, when we supposed we would need more money than we had in order to pay the arrears of pension. Eighteen million dollars was demanded by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Finance Committee reported that $18,000,000 of bonds should be sold. A few of us, knowing that there were $10,000,000 lying in the Treasury under the pretense of guarding the fractional currency which had been ordered to be withdrawn, said, as a counter-proposition, take that $10,000,000 to pay pensions; there is no use for it lying there. The Senate and House agreed with us. We refused to allow bonds to the amount of $18,000,000 or any other amount to be sold as demanded by the Finance Committee and by the Secretary of the Treasury. What was the result? To-day it is developed that out of the total issue of $45,000,000 of fractional currency, for which they were holding $10,000,000 in reserve to guard, $15,000,000, or nearly that amount, will never be presented; one-third of the whole has been lost by the people and gained by the Government. The $10,000,000 was at that time being held to guard the $15,000,000, which did not exist, as the balance had been redeemed before that time.

But more bonds, more debt, more discretion is demanded all the time. The reason I had for introducing the bill I have just read is that I hope we will be wise enough to reduce our taxation before this Congress adjourns to a point where the $250,000,000 of unpaid 3 per cent. bonds will cover the surplus until about 1891, when the four-and-a-halfs mature; that we will not buy bonds at the rate of $100,000,000 or $150,000,000 a year and by so doing disturb all the business interests of the country, but that we will reduce taxation to the wants of the country, to a point where we will surely pay the $250,000,000 of 3 percents now outstanding before the four-and-a-halfs mature in 1891, and not in three years, as we will under our present tax system.

However, for fear that if we provide for liberal expenditures and make reasonable reductions of taxation somebody would raise the cry, as some are always too ready to do, that we are going to starve the Government and leave it without the means of payment in our efforts to reduce taxes, I propose by this bill that out of the $150,000,000 or $160,000,000 that are lying in the Treasury doing nobody any good, especially when $100,000,000 is all that anybody contends ever can be needed or ever was pledged as a reserve, the Secretary shall use all the money in excess of $100,000,000 to meet any possible falling off of the revenue that may exist to meet the expenditures that Congress may see fit to make.

I desire thus to answer in advance the argument that the Government is likely to be starved by any attempt to reduce taxation; and the measure to readjust the bank circulation now presented by the Finance Committee to the Senate is in my judgment only valuable as an adjunct to an honest effort to reduce taxation. We allow the banks circulation up to par upon the bonds; in the mean time we will endeavor to so legislate as not to strike the bonds down by paying them off with an excess in surplus of revenue; but we will give the people relief from taxes. This will enable the bonds to run from six to seven years, giving time to exchange their securities, if we can relieve the country from burdens and accumulate only a small surplus of revenue annually instead of a large one. Two hundred and fifty million dollars of other bonds will mature in 1891, and of course the premium on them will diminish by the time we exhaust these now payable. In the mean time, out of this large surplus, over $150,000,000, which has so long remained idle in the Treasury, reaching sometimes to $160,000,000, if by any accident of war or by any complication or panic our revenue should not come in so as to meet our expenses, there is a fund which the Secretary of the Treasury should be directed to draw upon without increasing the public debt of the United States.

It was said a little while ago that the act of 1875, the resumption act, was what made the legal-tenders good. It was not. We restored the silver dollar about that time, that did the work, and in 1878 we had a hostile Secretary of the Treasury who was seeking to disparage in every way our legal-tender notes, which I insist is the best currency in the world. By the way, while they are now counted at $346,000,000, I doubt whether there are $310,000,000 of them in existence to-day. They have gone through war; they have gone through fire and flood. I remember it was estimated that a good many millions were lost in the great Chicago fire. We are now counting every dollar that was ever issued, just as the Secretary insisted that there were $45,000,000 fractional currency to be redeemed when in fact $15,000,000, as is now developed by all the returns, was destroyed in the hands of the people; about 33 per cent. Of course nothing like as large a percentage of greenbacks has been destroyed as there was of fractional currency, but you will find in all probability from 8 to 10 per cent. of it gone, much more than of the national-bank circulation, and the loss in that the Secretary thinks is much larger than the Comptroller of the Currency suggests. The greenbacks went through war, and have been scattered broadcast for twenty-odd years; $310,000,000 in my judgment is the maximum now outstanding of those notes. One hundred million dollars, therefore, instead of the $150,000,000 now held, is agreed by all even in the hands of the ordinary banker to be a sufficient fund for redemption. There can be no difficulty about the bill that I am advocating now. But it will come before us before long to be discussed more fully. I wish its merits to be understood in advance of the adverse report which I expect from the committee.

What I rose to say more than all else was that these statutes relative to coin payments and sinking funds are held to be so sacred when they apply to things that gentlemen want to have them regarded as sacred about, but they are not regarded at all when the statutes require anything to be done that a majority of the Senate or the Secretary of the Treasury does not want. There can be no plainer provision than that legal-tender notes should not be accepted at the custom-house; there can be no plainer fact than that the Secretary of the Treasury does receive them at the custom-house, and I agree made them as good as gold the moment he did, and could have done so long before if he had wanted to; yet the Finance Committee made an adverse report on my bill substituting law for discretion, and perhaps there will be an adverse vote of the Senate on authorizing them to be taken in accordance with law. I propose to test that and see if we must allow them to be taken at the custom-house illegally because a Secretary of the Treasury is unwilling to be required to obey the law, and insists on his right to violate it even if it is part of the sacred pledge on which his sinking fund rests.

I shall make an earnest effort, however, in the Senate before that bill is finally defeated to substitute law for discretion. When the Secretary of the Treasury was told that he must pay the interest on the public debt in the coin received at the custom-house, and we said the silver coin must be received, and he showed that over $12,000,000 of it had been so received when he answered our resolution, and numerous certificates far beyond that, and still said he had not paid a dollar of it on the interest of the public debt, as required by law, but turned it into the Treasury and locked it up, and then said nobody wanted it, and all the men who had determined to make gold and gold alone the currency of the country when they alone could obtain gold, I hoped Congress would require the law to be obeyed; but it paid no attention to it. Surely no Secretary ought ever to be allowed to have discretion over such immense interests. See how vast a discretion gentlemen admit is vested in the Secretary in regard to this so-called reserve fund now in the Treasury. It seems to be conceded that if the Secretary of the Treasury could lawfully buy $95,000,000 of gold and lay it away he could lawfully buy one thousand million dollars in so-called aid of resumption. If he can hold $150,000,000 he may hold $350,000,000 in the Treasury, and claim that in his opinion it is necessary to hold gold dollar for dollar with the outstanding greenbacks, and we are to bow to his opinion as though he was above the law-making power of the country.

It is because this question of discretion has been so freely discussed and so fully developed in the arguments to-day that I said I was gratified at the range the debate had taken, because it bears upon other bills yet to be considered and bears upon the great question that we ought to keep the control of our finances in our hands. One word more. The legal-tender notes never were protected until May, 1878. Three years after the resumption act was passed Congress had to interfere just as it had for the silver coin when a hostile Secretary of the Treasury was endeavoring to strike it down. On the 31st of May, 1878, Congress passed the following act:

> That from and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury or other officer under him to cancel or retire any more of the United States legal-tender notes. And when any of said notes may be redeemed or be received into the Treasury under any law from any source whatever, and shall belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, cancelled, or destroyed, but they shall be reissued and paid out again, and kept in circulation.

Gentlemen then contended, as I have heard it contended this afternoon, that when these notes were once paid into the Treasury they could not be reissued. To prevent that construction we passed the law of 1878, that says they can be, and that they shall be, and the Secretary shall no longer have any discretion over them, and he never has had any discretion over them from that day until this, and never ought to have, and so it ought to be with all other things, their receipt at the custom-house especially. Fix the amount of reserve, if you please, at $100,000,000; that is 30 per cent. at least of all the legal-tenders that are outstanding in fact. It may not be quite 30 per cent. of the $346,000,000, but it is 30 per cent. of all that actually exist; that is quite as much as private bankers keep as a reserve. Say to the Secretary that he is not to maintain the pledges of 1862 when they suit him and refuse to obey the law when it does not. If we are going to pay as a sinking fund annually $50,000,000 and reduce our bonds that much, when we have already paid nearly $500,000,000 more than the law requires, let Congress and not the Secretary regulate the payments. If the coin which we receive at the custom-house is by law ordered to be paid to the creditors of the United States, let the Secretary be ordered to pay it. If we are going to take the greenbacks of the United States at the custom-house, let us say so and require the Secretary to obey the law.

I have said more than I intended. I am glad that this discussion has sprung up at last in regard to executive discretion. It will, I hope, result in Congress requiring obedience to law from every official, high and low.

GIFT OF STEAMSHIP ALERT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair) laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State, of the 21st instant, whereby your honorable body, and through you the people of the United Sates, may become apprised of the generous contribution made by her Britannic Majesty's Government toward the efforts for the relief of Lieutenant Greely's Arctic exploring party by presenting to the United States the Arctic steamship Alert.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 21, 1884.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message, with the accompanying documents, will be printed and laid on the table.

FORT MYER OBSERVATORY.

The following message from the President of the United States was read, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a letter from the Secretary of War, dated the 19th instant, submitting a letter from the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, dated the 2d instant, and its accompanying plan of a proposed meteorological observatory at Fort Myer, Virginia, together with an estimate of the cost of the same in the sum of $4,000, and a statement giving various reasons why said observatory should be established.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 21, 1884.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. MORGAN.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to appeal to the Senator from Delaware to ask the Senate to come to a vote. While I admit that the debate to-day has been intensely interesting, especially to all those of us who have been speaking, yet it seems to me that it would be just as applicable to any other financial bill on the Calendar as to the one before the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. I merely wish to say that we might have had a vote so far as I am concerned, notwithstanding the appeal of the Senator from Vermont. I desire it as much as he can, and I have done as little to delay it as he has.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN. The amendment which I have had the honor to bring to the attention of the Senate has been to some extent discussed in rather a discursive and unsatisfactory way, but a sufficient development of opinion has been obtained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please be in order. The Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. The opinion of the Senate has been sufficiently developed to satisfy me that——

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MORGAN. I will not.

Mr. HALE. I have a request to make about some papers which are about leaving the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I have been interrupted when on the floor almost every minute during the whole day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama declines to yield.

Mr. HALE. I wanted the papers just sent in from the President referred. I think it is proper that something should be done with them.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to their reference. They ought to lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. MORGAN. I will resume my remarks, or try to do so, where I left off. I said that the discussion of this question to-day had been rather discursive upon my amendment. Senators, in discussing the amendment, seemed to devote their attention mainly to other propositions. Some complaint has been made on the floor of the Senate, and I think with a good deal of reason, that the proposition I bring forward is in itself a new one, and has not had the proper consideration of a committee. To meet that view of the case, this morning I introduced a bill embodying the pending amendment and had it sent to the Committee on Finance. Feeling that I myself am not willing to take the responsibility of a measure of this kind without the assistance of the Committee on Finance, inasmuch as Senators seem not to have made up their minds about it and seem to wish a longer time for its consideration, and feeling also that the emergency which is upon the country will be to some extent relieved against by the bill reported by the committee, and that this question can be considered later in the session or perhaps at the next session, better than it can now, I ask permission of the Senate to withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama will be withdrawn. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. I understand the Senator from Mississippi desires to discuss the general subject of the currency, and especially with respect to the pending bill, at some length. It is now 4 o'clock. If the Senator from Mississippi will yield to me for that purpose, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I shall be very glad to yield at this hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope not, and——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope we shall reconsider the motion to adjourn over until Monday unless we can get through with this bill to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] has the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that the Senator from Mississippi does not desire to proceed with his remarks this evening. I think it is generally the custom to gratify a Senator when he expresses such a wish. It seems to me that we ought to adjourn or go into executive session.

Mr. INGALLS. If in order, I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to adjourn from to-day until Monday next. It is evident if this debate is to go on that we shall need to-morrow to complete it, as there is a special assignment for Monday. The bill to construct naval vessels is set for Monday next at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves that the vote by which the Senate agreed to adjourn from to-day until Monday be reconsidered.

The motion to reconsider was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 16, noes 30.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] is entitled to the floor on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 28, noes 12.

GIFT OF STEAMSHIP ALERT.

Mr. MILLER, of California. While the doors are being closed I move that the message of the President of the United States in relation to the steamer Alert, donated by the British Government, be referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty-six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 21, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Bishop B. WISTAR MORRIS, of Oregon.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting additional papers in the depredation claims of E. Montoya & Sons; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an abstract showing the nature, character, and amount of all Indian depredation claims reported to the Secretary of the Interior since December 1, 1883, to February 20, 1884; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES FOR 1879.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting report of the receipts and expenditures of the Government for the fiscal year 1879; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JAMES, until Tuesday next.

To Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, until the 29th instant, on account of important business.

To Mr. RIGGS, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

REPRINT.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent for an order of the House to reprint for the use of the House Report No. 115, from the Committee on Pensions, to accompany the bill (H. R. 3962) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war and others therein named, and for other purposes, the first print having been exhausted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 448) to fix the time for holding the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States in the northern district of Iowa.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KEIFER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BLAND. I ask the gentleman to withhold that call until I can have referred to a committee a Senate bill now on the Speaker's table.

Mr. DIBRELL. I rise to a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will submit it.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DIBRELL, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported a bill (H. R. 5261) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. CASSIDY. I rise to submit a privileged report from the Committee on the Pacific Railroads.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will submit it.

Mr. CASSIDY. I report back from that committee with a recommendation that it be adopted the resolution of inquiry which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the House when the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and of each part thereof, was definitely and finally located, and the plat or plats of such definite and final location filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, so far as said railroad has been definitely located, giving the date of the filing of each plat in said office, if more than one plat has been filed, and the length of line designated in each plat. And that he also inform the House whether the Northern Pacific Railroad Company has claimed or is claiming any lands on which homestead or pre-emption entries have been made within the limits of the grant to said company opposite to any part of the line of said railroad prior to the line of final definite location of such part of said line; and, if so, whether such claims of said company are being considered by his Department.

Mr. BELFORD. From what committee does that resolution come?

Mr. CASSIDY. From the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

Mr. CALKINS. Let the report be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that there is no written report accompanying the resolution.

Mr. CASSIDY. There is one on the back of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. That is a mere indorsement, and the Chair thinks is not a report in writing within the meaning of the rule.

Mr. CASSIDY. I will withdraw the resolution for the present.

PRINTING TESTIMONY.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed to investigate the charges against H. V. Boynton be authorized from time to time to print the testimony taken for the use of the committee.

There was no objection; and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KEIFER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. KEIFER. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to urge the consideration of the general appropriation bill which was taken up yesterday. As committees were fully called yesterday for reports, I move to dispense with the morning hour to-day for the call of committees for reports.

The SPEAKER. That requires a two-third vote.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. KEIFER; and upon a division there were—ayes 103, noes 22.

So (no further count being called for) the motion to dispense with the morning hour was agreed to.

Mr. KEIFER. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BLAND in the chair.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole, and resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes. The bill is now being considered by paragraphs under the five-minute rule. The Clerk will resume the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of three instructors of cavalry, artillery, and infantry tactics, in addition to pay as second lieutenants, $1,500.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to amend by adding to the paragraph just read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the sum of $200,000 be appropriated for the purpose of conducting a school at West Point, N. Y., wherein cadets nominated by the President, Senators, and Members of Congress may be fitted for entrance to the Military Academy located at that point, and each cadet nominated by those authorized to make the nominations shall be entitled to receive two years' schooling before his claims to admission in the Military Academy are passed upon.

Mr. KEIFER. I make a point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. BELFORD. I hope the gentleman will allow me to be heard before insisting on the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. That is a matter for the Chair. The point I make is that the amendment proposes new legislation and does not reduce expenditures.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to strike out the entire paragraph.

Mr. KEIFER. Does the gentleman withdraw the amendment read by the Clerk?

Mr. BELFORD. I do, if the gentleman makes a point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. I must make the point of order. The amendment proposes to provide for a preparatory school and authorizes for that purpose an appropriation of $200,000. This is wholly new legislation and increases expenditures. It is therefore out of order under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order well taken.

Mr. BELFORD. Then I move to amend by striking out the last word. The amendment which I sought to offer a moment ago was designed to allow those who are intrusted by the law of the land with the nomination of cadets to this snob institution at West Point to exercise some authority with regard thereto. That was my object. I represent a State, and therefore have a right as a member of this House to designate a student who in the interest of the nation shall be educated at its expense. That is a right conferred upon each member by the law of this Republic. But I declare that as matters stand to-day it is an empty and barren right, subject to constant supervision by a board of professors at that institution. I may select from my State the brightest boy in it and have him examined by the president of our State university, by college professors, by gentlemen thoroughly cultivated in all the graces of literature; I may send him to that institution; and while his mind may be as bright as a burnished diamond, these gentlemen at West Point declare to me that unless he answers properly some question in grammar he will be rejected. What in the name of God has grammar to do with fighting a battle? [Laughter.] What has grammar to do practically with sighting a rifle?

I tried to get into the war in 1861. I went and was examined; but on account of some little physical disability, an infirmity which it is not necessary for me to mention [laughter], I was ruled out.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BELFORD. Wait a minute. I have traveled over the Rocky Mountains twenty-five miles a day on foot; I shot a deer last fall running with the speed of a locomotive train; but these gentlemen told me that I could not see well enough to shoot down an enemy of my country. [Laughter.]

I think it is about time that this House of Representatives should inspect this institution and withdraw from its professors the power to exclude from it a student recommended for admission by intelligent educational professors of my State or others. I hope that this appropriation bill will be defeated and that money will be withheld, for a while at least, from this institution, until we teach those snobs that we have a right to nominate a student when he is indorsed by the intelligent men of our districts or States, and that until they recognize this right we will withhold from them the money that furnishes them their bread and their wine.

Mr. BEACH. I wish to ask the gentleman from Colorado whether I understood him correctly that he was an applicant for a cadetship at West Point in 1861?

Mr. BELFORD. No, sir; I did not say so.

Mr. BEACH. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. BELFORD. I said I wanted to go into the Army in 1861, but though I could walk thirty or forty miles a day and could with my rifle shoot a deer on a dead run, they said I was not fit to go into the army.

Mr. BEACH. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. RANDALL rose.

Mr. KEIFER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] desire to speak?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; I want the reading of the bill proceeded with.

Mr. KEIFER. That is my purpose also. Unless some gentleman desires specially to answer the gentleman from Colorado, I ask that the pro forma amendment be withdrawn.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I am utterly unable to comprehend the remarks to which we have just listened, as well as other remarks of similar tenor. All this talk about "snobbery" I can not understand. I know this—and it is about all I wish to state—that for more than twenty-five years the district in which I have lived and which I now have the honor to represent has continuously had a cadet at the West Point Academy, and there has never been a single complaint in regard to the standard of qualification required. No applicant from my district was ever rejected, and hence no complaint was made on that account. I wish to add that during all these years the places at West Point, and more lately at Annapolis, have been filled from our district by young men who were educated in the common schools, and who had enjoyed very few opportunities indeed for obtaining an education. Not a single one of them ever saw the inside of an academy or of a college. They came from the common schools, and in some cases were never even graduates of those schools. Most of them have been poor young men; young men who had no start in the world; young men whose parents were poor, who had no property, no means with which they could be educated, and I never yet before heard this complaint. I have not any sympathy for such talk; I do not believe it.

I do know, Mr. Chairman, that young men who leave West Point have a little of the same feeling that young men have who graduate from other collegiate institutions of the country, but this soon wears off; it will not last; and the same objection will apply with equal force to the graduates of Yale and Harvard, and from a hundred other colleges, which now lies against this West Point Military Academy. For one, sir, I do not believe the objection is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of cadets, $170,000; and no cadet shall receive more than at the rate of $540 a year.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I offer the following amendment, Mr. Chairman, to come in after the paragraph just read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That hereafter any student found guilty of the offense of hazing shall be expelled from the academy, and shall not be eligible to reappointment under any circumstances.

Mr. KEIFER. I think that amendment is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee on the point of order.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I hope the point of order will not be insisted against my amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. I will reserve the point of order to enable the gentleman to make his speech, and after he has concluded I will reply to him and show the amendment is not at all necessary.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I am much obliged, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Ohio in charge of the bill for reserving his point of order, and will now ask the indulgence of the House while I briefly give my reasons for proposing the amendment which has been read from the Clerk's desk. To my mind it is one that should prevail. What spectacle have we presented before us to day? Since this House has been in session, since the last week began, we have had at the corrresponding academy at Annapolis, carried on by the United States, the trial of cadets for the offense of hazing. It is an offense that is a disgrace to the Military as well as the Naval Academy. It is an offense that this Congress ought to put down at every hazard, and if the officers do not enforce the law, we ought to dismiss them from the positions they now hold and in their place select those who will.

I do not know how true the statement is, but it has come to me, and I believe it to be true, that the practice is tolerated of allowing those who have been there for years to require of the timid and, in many cases, defenseless students who come there for the first time the ignoble service of blacking their boots. Every indignity that dispirits, every indignity that would take away that American manhood which is the boast of the American soldier, is tolerated there. While occasionally students are tried for it, yet almost as frequently the rules are relaxed, and those same students are permitted to be readmitted. The object of this amendment is to provide that under no circumstances, under no pretext by reason of Army or social influence or blood or family standing, shall a student who so far forgets his manhood as to trample upon the young men who cross the threshold of those academies for the first time be readmitted to be educated at the public expense. It is the duty of this Congress to provide boldly and emphatically when once convicted they shall never be permitted to return to that institution. If this law had been enforced at the academy, if such notice as this had been given, probably the disgrace we have lately witnessed would not have characterized the Naval Academy.

These, Mr. Chairman, are my reasons for moving this amendment, and it is such conduct as this that brings down upon West Point and the Annapolis Academy the strictures of the gentleman from the West. Such conduct should never receive the silent approval of the members of this House. It is a matter in reference to which we should not hesitate.

When such an offense is committed, what excuse is there for it? Why are students permitted to trample upon those who cross the threshold of these schools for the first time? Why are these young men allowed to be treated worse, indeed, than slaves of any country would be treated? Let him who is willing the cadet from his district shall be trampled in this way vote against my amendment. Let him who is willing to see the future defenders of this country treated like slaves on their first entrance into these institutions vote against my amendment. Let him who is willing to see these young men degraded by the practice of hazing on the part of those who have been there for a few years make points of order and rule out my amendment if they will. But I say to you, Mr. Chairman, so far as I am able to judge, the American people feel there should be reform inaugurated at both the Naval Academy and West Point. Let us begin to do it to-day, and if we can not do it to-day let us do it to-morrow, and if we cannot do it to-morrow let us do it next week; let us never stop until the offense of hazing has disappeared forever from these institutions kept up at Government expense for the education of these young men.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KEIFER. I do not object, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman making a speech against the great wrong of hazing in the Military or Naval Academy. The proposition the gentleman from Tennessee submits is not one that I am opposed to in itself, if in my judgment it were necessary to embody it in an appropriation bill. The gentleman has not stated that at West Point anything like hazing has occurred recently. I think nothing of that kind has occurred; and when the gentleman indicates that there has been any policy there for many years that tolerates it, he simply fails to understand fully the history of that institution.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have stated that very recently, to my own knowledge, such a thing has occurred at Annapolis.

Mr. KEIFER. That may have happened under peculiar circumstances or there may have been instances where such things have occurred; but certainly not with the consent of any of the officers of that institution at West Point. In order to show that the present superintendent of that institution goes as far as the gentleman from Tennessee proposes, if not further, in that direction, I desire to have read from the desk a paragraph of the superintendent's report upon this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

The practice of hazing, some instances of which have come to the knowledge of the authorities during the year, may deserve a passing notice in a report of this character. I observe that my predecessors for the last twenty-five years have reported at one time or another that the practice had been broken up. I am sorry to believe that they have without exception been mistaken. By repressive measures the evil has been at times restricted to its lowest limits, but it has never been eradicated. At the first moment repression has ceased the brutal custom has sprung up with new features of brutality. While I do not favor threats to repress disorders or pledges from cadets as a means of eradicating violations of the regulations, I am certain that the best means of maintaining discipline in any organization is the certainty of summary punishment, just but severe, in all cases of intentional offense. If cadets intentionally violate the regulations in anything which involves their dismissal, they do so under one or other of the convictions that they will not be detected or that some influence will prevent their punishment. In this matter of hazing the authorities here will indulge in no half-hearted measures to detect the offenders or in the matter of punishments. The experience of the past will convince the guilty that they may not expect mercy from the War Department. Under these circumstances I see no reason why the pernicious practice may not permanently be put an end to.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That, I suggest, Mr. Chairman, proves fully the statement I have made that if this practice is to be broken up some statutory action is necessary.

Mr. KEIFER. That proves everything but the main statement the gentleman made, which was to the effect that that institution tolerated hazing and needed some statutory provision to compel the enforcement of restrictions against it.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio if there is not already a general statute which provides that parties dismissed from either West Point or Annapolis shall be forever ineligible to reappointment?

Mr. KEIFER. I am not able to say.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I think there is.

Mr. KEIFER. It may be that you are right. I am not able to speak positively now upon the subject.

Mr. MCMILLIN. My amendment goes to the extent that if they are found to be guilty of this offense, even before sentence is passed upon them, they are forever ineligible to reappointment.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to add further that the Secretary of War under the law is authorized to fix rules and regulations for the discipline and proper management and conduct of the cadets of this institution.

It is therefore not wise for us to attempt to lay down any policy with reference to the internal government of the institution. But if it be so that it is wise, let such suggestion come from the distinguished Committee on Military Affairs after they have examined into it, and not attempt in this manner to attach to an appropriation bill as such legislation. This bill, I am proud to say, has no new legislation upon it up to this time, and I hope it will have none.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hold that the point of order is well taken and the amendment is not in order.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I desire to state, Mr. Chairman, that I am in favor of such a provision——

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not now before the House, having been ruled out.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Then I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of making a statement in reply to that portion of the report of the superintendent of the academy which has been read at the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee. But I would go further, and provide that the dismissal should only be determined on the findings and sentence of a court-martial.

Three years ago, Mr. Chairman, I nominated a young man for this institution. In the third year of his examination he stood fifth or sixth in his class. During the last summer there were charges made of hazing. Some one was pushed into the ditch. The superintendent of the academy called up these young men and questioned them in reference to the matter, but they did not reply. There was no response to his questions. The young man from my district had the manliness to stand up in the presence of the superintendent and say to him that he declined to answer the question. The others were silent. That young man was summarily dismissed from the academy. The young man who committed the hazing, the boy who pushed his fellow-cadet into the ditch, will graduate in June. My young man, as bright as any in that institution, was dismissed—dismissed for no reason in the world, as shown by the evidence, as shown by a petition signed by every member of his class, except that he would not tell on a comrade.

I say, therefore, Mr. Chairman, these summary dismissals by the superintendent, approved by the Secretary of War, are not the proper method of dealing with young men after they have passed the third year.

Young men that are 21 years of age, simply because they follow the rule which has been followed by the students almost from time immemorial and failed to tell on their comrades, are dismissed summarily from the institution, and the young man who has committed the act graduates and becomes one of the honored officers of the Army.

I would go further than the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN], and provide that every one found guilty of hazing, after trial, should be dismissed. These young men are not school-boys. They are just about to graduate into the Army, and it is our duty to see that the guilty ones do not escape while the innocent are punished.

Mr. BUDD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUDD. What would become of the discipline of the Military Academy at West Point if a young man was permitted to set at defiance the authority of his officers?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. There is a regulation providing a punishment of twenty days when they decline to answer.

Mr. BUDD. Do you think one who would refuse to answer a question like that under such circumstances would make a good soldier?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I do.

Mr. BEACH. I find, as regards all these gentlemen who have charges to make against the military discipline at West Point, when those charges are sifted down it is found they have a personal grievance. I wish to say, and it is due to the House and the country that they should know it, that the present superintendent at West Point has set his face strongly against hazing. As proof of the fact I desire to call the attention of the House to a matter which came within my own personal observation within the last three months.

The cadet I appointed was last June charged with hazing, and was dismissed from the academy. I went over to West Point. I happen to represent the district and live within four miles of West Point. I had a personal interview with General Merritt, and made an effort to have the cadet reinstated; but the superintendent positively declined to reinstate that young man, and he has not been reinstated.

I am furthermore informed that there is a fixed regulation that any young man who has been dismissed from the academy is ineligible to a reappointment; so that that portion of the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee would have no force or effect. It is the law, the existing law to-day.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York, is it not a fact that what he refers to is merely a regulation of the academy, which may at their discretion be withdrawn?

Mr. BEACH. It is a regulation that is observed at all times under the present superintendent.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. McMILLIN. Before that paragraph is left I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 31 strike out "$170,000" and insert "$165,000;" and at the end of line 33 add the following:

Provided, That hereafter any student found guilty of the offense of hazing shall be expelled from the academy and shall not be eligible to readmission under any circumstances.

Mr. KEIFER. I make the point of order against the proviso in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee that it is not germane to that part of the bill and that it changes existing law, while it does not of itself reduce expenditures. It does not reduce expenditures with reference to the subject-matter of the amendment.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, it will not do for a gentleman to move to strike out a portion of an appropriation bill that relates to a different matter and couple with it an amendment that relates to something else and then claim that the third clause of Rule XXI permits him to do that. It is only against the proviso that I make the point of order. If the gentleman insists on the other part of his amendment which is wholly independent of the proviso the point of order will not lie against it.

Mr. McMILLIN. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio, I will say that the amendment taken altogether reduces the amount appropriated by the bill, and hence is not obnoxious to the rule. The reason I make the amendment include both the reduction and the proviso, for the two portions of it should go together, is that if this law is enforced there will be a less appropriation needed.

The amount appropriated by the bill, I am inclined to think, is not necessary. We appropriated last year only $160,000 in place of $170,000 as provided by this bill. And I think the amount stated in my amendment will cover all that is necessary for the expenses of the students during the next year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that that portion of the amendment which proposes to change existing law is not in order. The proviso is not in order. That portion of it, however, which strikes out a part of the appropriation would be in order.

Mr. McMILLIN. I suggest that under the proviso the pay would be stopped for the cadets found guilty of hazing.

Mr. KEIFER. Upon that portion of the amendment which is in order I may remark that it would be quite unfortunate, perhaps, to cut down this appropriation. The Committee on Appropriations have looked into that subject with all the care they could. In view, as I stated yesterday, of the increased number of cadets at West Point growing out of the fact that there was an increase of thirty-two members in the present House, many of whom have not yet succeeded in getting cadets into West Point, it was believed it would take at least $10,000 more for the coming fiscal year to maintain the cadets at the academy than during the present fiscal year. The total number now allowed at that institution, as I said yesterday, is three hundred and forty-four.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My friend is entirely mistaken.

Mr. KEIFER. No, I am not mistaken.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The Secretary of War states that on the 1st of September last there were some three hundred and eleven students.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman undertakes to correct me. Let him examine the statistics and correct himself. I said that the total number of students at West Point provided by law is three hundred and forty-four. The total number for which this bill makes provision is three hundred and fourteen, allowing for some thirty vacancies which may be at that institution.

Now, if we undertake to cut down the amount provided by this bill we may find that we have not appropriated money enough. The appropriation merely covers the sum which is required to pay each student for one year at the rate of $540 each. The total amount appropriated is intended to cover such number as may be there receiving the benefits of the institution. If the amount, $170,000, shall prove to be too much, then it will not all be used. If it should not be enough, then there will be the misfortune of the institution finding itself without provision to do what the law itself authorizes to be done.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] insist upon that portion of his proposed amendment which strikes out $175,000 and inserts $165,000?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Insist upon it; I desire to be heard.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] desires to speak upon the amendment. I will permit him to do so, and when he has concluded I will answer the inquiry of the Chair.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am perfectly willing that every dollar actually needed for the support of the Military Academy at West Point shall be appropriated; but I am unwilling that an appropriation shall be made that is not necessary.

As the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] has offered this amendment, I will undertake to correct the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], who I think is mistaken in his figures. The average attendance at West Point during the last ten years will be found to fall below two hundred and fifty students. This bill makes provision for three hundred and fourteen. Last year, after the law had been passed providing for an increased representation there, a Republican Congress declined to make an appropriation exceeding $160,000, which is provision for two hundred and ninety-six students.

I have here a table furnished by the Secretary of War, showing that on the 1st day of September last, a time in the year when there is the largest number of students present, there were only three hundred and eleven students at West Point. The examination that occurred in January last caused the dropping out of some twenty students, bringing the number down to about two hundred and ninety.

The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee makes provision for three hundred and six students, some fifteen or sixteen more than the number now in attendance at West Point, and in my judgment the next examination, in June, will cause the dropping out of other students because of failure in their examinations.

I have here a table showing that during the last ten years the unexpended balance remaining of the appropriations for these salaries ranged from $3,000 to $40,000. This is the table; and it also shows the average attendance annually during that period:

Statement of the number of cadets at the United States Military Academy present September 1 in each of the ten years from 1873 to 1882; also, the rates of their annual pay, the aggregate amounts appropriated and expended therefor, the average number of cadets paid, and the amount covered into the Treasury for each of said fiscal years.

Year.	Cadets present September 1.	Annual salary.	Amount appropriated for fiscal year.	Amount expended in fiscal year.	Average number of cadets paid.	Amount covered into the Treasury at end of fiscal year.
1873	275	$609 50	$178,583 50	$156,732 14	257	$21,851 36
1874	280		192,204 00	165,877 17	272	26,326 83
1875	313		186,656 00	179,223 79	294	7,432 21
1876	309		167,400 00	156,975 00	291	10,425 00
1877	286		167,400 00	141,547 50	262	25,852 50
1878	305		157,500 00	154,474 50	286	3,025 50
1879	287	540 00	150,000 00	146,638 50	272	3,361 50
1880	259		160,000 00	130,147 50	241	29,852 50
1881	238		160,000 00	119,455 50	221	40,544 50
1882	271		150,000 00	135,717 00	251	14,283 00
1883	311	540 00	160,000 00	.....	.....	.....

It will be further seen by an examination of this table that in 1879 the appropriation of $150,000 for this purpose was ample to provide for all the students at the academy and to leave an unexpended balance. There is no question in my mind that if we shall fix the amount at $165,000, as proposed by the amendment of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN], or at $160,000, the amount appropriated last year, there will be an unexpended balance at the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. ELLIS. What becomes of it?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It remains in the Treasury.

Mr. ELLIS. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If my friend desires to vote an appropriation of a sum entirely useless and unnecessary, I do not understand the motive that can prompt him to do it. While I am in favor of appropriating every dollar that is needed, I am unwilling that the people's money shall be appropriated for unnecessary purposes.

Mr. ELLIS. The "people's money" is not expended unless absolutely necessary. The gentleman treats it as if, when this bill shall have passed, the money it appropriates will be gone forever. The fact is, that the committee simply desire to cover all possible expenditures.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman who is now addressing me was a member of the Committee on Appropriations in the last Congress, and then came in here and supported a bill which appropriated only $160,000 for this purpose.

Mr. ELLIS. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And this year he comes in, during this session of Congress, supporting an increased appropriation for this purpose, with no evidence, in my judgment, that can support the idea that any more is necessary this year than last.

Mr. ELLIS. There are thirty-two more students allowed now.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I beg your pardon; there is not that number.

Mr. ELLIS. There is that number provided for by law.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In my judgment the average attendance of students for next year, the year we are now providing for, will fall below two hundred and seventy. The average attendance last year fell to two hundred and fifty-one, because of failures in examination. I am satisfied that if this appropriation be reduced to $160,000, there will still be an unexpended balance. I am therefore in favor of the amendment.

Mr. ELLIS. If the money is not expended it will remain in the Treasury.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does the Chair rule that the proviso of the amendment is out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so rules, because the proviso does not reduce expenditures, nor does the Chair think it entirely germane to the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the proviso can not go with the amendment I see no reason why the amendment should be adopted alone. It was in view of the proviso that the motion to strike out was made by me. I therefore withdraw the amendment.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] tries to place me in an inconsistent position; but the attempt will not bear the test of a little light. I did support the bill of last year, making an appropriation of $160,000 for this purpose; and this year I support the present bill proposing to appropriate $170,000. My reason is that there is an increase of membership at the academy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let the House understand fully that if the amount appropriated for this purpose should not be expended the portion unexpended will remain in the Treasury; there will be no waste, no extravagance. No student can receive more than the $540 allowed him by law. The committee simply intended to cover every possible contingency under the law in providing for these students—no more and no less.

Now suppose the gentleman's opinion should not correspond with the facts—and everybody's opinion is liable to fail sometimes—suppose there should be more students than the gentleman's table shows? Then if we should appropriate only the amount he proposes some of the students would be unprovided for; there would be a deficit, and a deficit coming in that way is disgraceful to this Government, especially when there is no possible chance of loss to the Government by making the appropriation large enough to provide for all contingencies.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move to amend by striking out the words "and seventy," in line 31, and by adding to the paragraph these words, "and the number of cadets shall be limited to two hundred."

Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment because I believe that the proportion of officers to enlisted men in our Army is already much too large—relatively larger than in any other army in the world; and by maintaining so large a number of cadets at West Point we provide for increasing the number of officers, already too large.

I am in favor, Mr. Chairman, of maintaining a high standard, of securing the best talent, and of giving to students thorough instruction at the Military Academy. But I find that we have now, for an army of less than 24,000 men, 2,176 officers on the active-list and something over 400 on the retired-list. This is more than twice the proportion of officers that would be required in a state of war and three times as many as are really necessary in a time of peace. The pay of the officers of the Army, as shown by the appropriation act of last year, is $6,052,164—almost double the pay of all the private soldiers in the Army; and if you add non-commissioned officers, Indian scouts, and all others, it amounts to nearly a million and three-quarters more than the entire pay of the enlisted men.

Now, our Military Academy system provides for increasing this number of officers out of all proportion, it seems to me, to the necessities of the country in time of peace. And it does not follow because we have educated officers doing nothing in time of peace that they will be ready for active service and make good soldiers in time of war. There is nothing so injurious to anybody as idleness; and a large official staff maintained in idleness for years are not well schooled for active and useful military service.

Again, the cost of our Military Academy is excessive—greater I believe than that of any military school maintained by any other government. I find that we are appropriating by this bill for the support of this institution something over $306,000—about $1,100 for each cadet. This is what it costs the Government annually to educate each of these young men. This is an example of Government school-keeping. The number of professors and instructors of all grades amounts to about one for every five cadets. Now it seems to me it would be wise, while maintaining the high standard of West Point education, to reduce the number of cadets, so that the proportion of Army officers to enlisted men will not be so excessive.

I find that this matter has been referred to by observers in other countries. Sir Archibald Forbes, in an article published in the North American Review a year or two ago, alludes to this condition of our Army, and likens it to a tadpole, in that it had a very large head and little else.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROSECRANS. I see by the record of graduates that the annual supply from the Military Academy falls short of the casualties.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Chairman, whatever may be the propriety of cutting down the number of cadets at the Military Academy, it seems to me the amendment ought not to prevail. It simply provides that the number of students shall be reduced to two hundred, thereby in effect repealing the law which allows each member of Congress to appoint one cadet, and not providing how the two hundred to be appointed shall be distributed among the States and Territories.

So that, whatever policy Congress shall adopt, this amendment should not prevail.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Let me say to the gentleman from Indiana that the number of cadets graduated from West Point is not sufficient now to fill the vacancies occurring in the Army, and that in addition a large number of officers is appointed in the Army from civil life.

Mr. CALKINS. I wish to say, in addition to what I have already mentioned, why in my judgment this amendment should not prevail. For one I do not believe in the policy of cutting down the number of cadets graduated at West Point. I believe in the policy of educating as many young men in that institution as possible. It may be, and probably is, true that many of them on graduating will go into private life after they have finished their education. As I have said, I believe it to be the true policy of the Government to educate as many young men at these institutions as possible, and let them go into private life if they will. When they graduate from these institutions they are as well prepared to take care of themselves and enter into any business avocation they may choose as any of the young men graduated from any of our colleges. I know there is a difference of opinion on that subject, but that is my judgment of the young men graduating from these institutions.

But, whatever policy may be adopted, certainly the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] should not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MAYO. What is the question before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. On the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. MAYO. We have not heard the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

The amendment of Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional pay of professors and to officers (on increased rank) for length of service, $8,898.50.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to strike out the paragraph just read by the Clerk.

Mr. KEIFER. Does the gentleman from Colorado propose to strike out the pay of these professors?

Mr. BELFORD. I do. This paragraph provides "for additional pay of professors and to officers (on increased rank) for length of service, $8,898.50," and that increased rank I propose to strike out. The gentlemen who have control of this Military Academy are always courteous to this representative body of the nation when they want to have additional pay or increase of rank. That is the only time they are humble and obliging, although they are national paupers fed out of the money in our coffers. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, according to the rules established at West Point there is not a member of this House who can pass an examination to secure admission into that academy.

A MEMBER. Let the gentleman speak for himself.

Mr. BELFORD. I am quite as well educated as any gentleman on this floor. [Laughter and applause.] I repeat, Mr. Chairman, there is not a member of this House who can answer the questions propounded to him by the professors of the Military Academy at West Point, any more than he can answer the questions propounded by the cranks of the Civil-Service Reform Commission [laughter and applause]—the men who are running that institution now as a kind of governmental monopoly wherever they can, so they can get their own friends into office and turn everybody else out. [Laughter and applause.] And you Democrats ought to have a professor detailed from this academy at West Point to educate you as to the practicability of enjoying Government office if you should happen to come into power next year. [Laughter and applause.]

I desire the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] who has reported this bill to inform this House if this increase should be given. When I wish to have an amendment incorporated into this bill appropriating $200,000 for the purpose of establishing a preliminary school to educate the youths of this Republic, he, in consistent action with the white-buttoned mandarins of the Appropriations Committee, raised the point of order and had my amendment ruled out, and by that very act disqualified me from sending a student to that academy. He disqualifies you, too, gentlemen. He puts your Congressional right in the basket of the board of professors.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. I oppose the amendment, and the discussion being exhausted, I ask for a vote.

Mr. BELFORD. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I renew the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in looking over this Military Academy bill for this year, as well as for last year, I find ten items giving additional pay to officers and professors at West Point. In the main the instructors are officers of the Army. The first item of the bill is for the pay of eight professors, $25,500. The next item is for one commandant of cadets, in addition to his pay as captain in the line, $1,200. In addition to his regular pay the next instructor of practical military engineering is given $900. The next is for one instructor of ordnance and science of gunnery, who receives in addition to his pay as an officer of the Army $900. Then comes a provision for the pay of eight assistant professors, who receive in addition to their regular, legitimate, fixed pay by law, $4,000. Then comes a provision for pay of three instructors of cavalry, artillery, and infantry tactics in addition to pay as second lieutenants, $1,500. And so it runs on through ten items, until we come to the tenth paragraph, for additional pay of professors and to officers (on increased rank) for length of service, $8,898.50.

If the present pay-table of the Army is not sufficient, it is the duty of Congress to rearrange it, to rerate it, and provide for it by a regular act of Congress, and not attempt in this way to give additional pay to men who seek employment by this kind of detail from their regular duties in the Army by adding $8,898.50 to what the law provides, to the pay, too, of the other officers and professors not provided for in the other nine items of the bill. It is not specified which professors are to be benefited by this provision, but they have gone on and provided for every conceivable one that can be thought of; and then they come in with a round sum of $8,800 more to be added and divided among them all. I say if the present rate of pay is not sufficient, let it be fixed by law and by a provision specific and clear, and not attempt to come in here and add in this unjustifiable way to the pay of professors who are already receiving remunerative salaries. There are a number of officers now in the Army who would gladly fill the position of professors at West Point and ask no more than to receive the pay to which they are now entitled. I oppose the adding of this unnecessary appropriation and the addition of unwarranted pay to officers and professors who are detailed for this work, and who receive regular salaries fixed by law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, a sufficient reason might be given and an answer made to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois by a very simple recital of the facts and the statement that the gentleman is totally mistaken as to the condition of the law. He says in his speech that we ought to fix the pay of these officers by law, and arrange it in that way and not provide for it in an appropriation bill. In answer I wish to say that I concur with him fully in that respect. But let me inform him that each one of the items of this appropriation bill to which he refers provides an appropriation exactly as required by and in accordance with the terms of the law as it has existed for many years. The particular item that he proposes to strike out is also provided for by law; and this is an item simply carrying into execution, for the pay of those professors, a requirement of the statutes now in force.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. Why is it that the Committee on Appropriations find it necessary to add to the appropriations for the pay of these professors and officers at that academy an aggregate amount of $19,998?

Mr. KEIFER. Where is that?

Mr. THOMAS. It is the sum of the additions of the different items to which I have already alluded.

Mr. KEIFER. Where is the amount?

Mr. THOMAS. It is made up of the $8,898 of this section now under consideration, $900 in another place, $1,500 in another, and so on throughout the ten items of the bill to which I have referred.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman takes it for granted, then, that this is in addition to the law. It is not. The $8,898.50 is expressly provided for by section 1336 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. It has no reference to paying these professors more than their ordinary pay; but this particular item provides for paying the professors and officers on duty at this academy their longevity pay, as fixed by law, after a service of ten years. And if we were to strike out this item now there would be simply a deficiency at the close of the year, because, in accordance with existing law, these professors are entitled to receive this amount, and just the amount that is now appropriated by the present bill.

The other items to which the gentleman refers contained in the bill, and which he indicates, giving to the assistant instructors of cavalry, artillery, and infantry tactics, &c., additional pay, are put in here in accordance with different sections of the statutes—section 1335, section 1338, &c. These sections provide for this additional pay. It is not longevity pay. It is not paid by reason of long service. But it is an extra compensation paid by reason of the kind of service they are required to be upon at the academy and the additional expense incident to that service, which arises of course principally from the style of living that they must keep up while at the institution.

Mr. LYMAN. Let me ask the gentleman a question. If there is anything in this bill which is unusual as an appropriation bill for West Point Academy or whether it is not a fair average of the bills ordinarily passed for that institution?

Mr. KEIFER. I know of nothing different, certainly on this part of the bill.

Mr. LYMAN. Then what is the use of discussing it; let us pass it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This additional pay provided for in this paragraph to officers is an addition to the extra pay provided for them on page 2 for their sevices at the academy in excess of their pay as officers of the Army. It is just such accumulations of expenditures as this that makes the Military Academy at West Point, for the field it covers, the most costly school in the world—a school at which it costs more to educate a student in the same branches than at any other school in this or any other country. To the extent, then, Mr. Chairman, that cadets who are admitted to that school resign, as many do within two or three years, it amounts to a free education to those who are appointed there. And in reply to the gentleman from Indiana I will say that every cadet who graduates at West Point understands that he is commissioned for the rest of his life to ride through the world upon the backs of other people; first in the Army, whether in service or idle, and then at a certain age upon the retired-list. I hold then that this multiplying of officers, this increase of the official staff of our Army in such excess of the needs of the service, is an expense that ought to be cut down, for certainly the country gets no adequate return for the expenditure.

Mr. MAYO. Mr. Chairman, if this question is still pending——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] withdrew the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. By what authority did the gentleman from Ohio withdraw my amendment?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I did not withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] is still pending.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the last word. I have made some little inquiry as to the comparative cost of our West Point institution and of the other first-class colleges in the United States in the one item of professorships alone, and I find, sir, while in the great literary institutions of the country the highest salary paid is $4,000, which is in Harvard, the lowest is $1,700, which is in Bowdoin College. The average compensation paid to the professors in the nine great literary institutions of the country is $2,694. This embraces Harvard, Yale, La Fayette, Princeton, Bowdoin, Brown University, Cornell, University of California, and the University of Michigan. I should think it would be somewhat difficult to select nine great institutions in this country that could claim a higher rank than these, and yet the average compensation paid to the professors in those universities is $2,694.

As I understand the matter, independently of this longevity feature of some eight or nine thousand dollars, the lowest amount paid to these professors at West Point is $3,600, and the highest is $4,500 and residences. I think, therefore, even without this longevity pay, the compensation paid to these West Point professors is ample.

Besides that, I wish to call the attention of the committee to another fact. I ask what institution of learning in this country shows such extravagance in the number of its professors, the number of students considered?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. RANDALL was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. HOLMAN.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am obliged to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]. But I have said about all I designed to say.

I wish simply to call the attention of the committee to the fact that in this institution of learning we display the same tendency toward extravagance in Government, departing from the old-time economy, that is shown everywhere else; and that in that institution we could at least without any possible injury to the public service approximate in some degree in the volume of our expenditure to the expenses incurred in other corresponding institutions in the country. If it were true that the results of that institution surpassed in magnitude the other great institutions of the country, an argument might be made in its behalf on that basis. But I must say, though it seems to be the settled policy of the country that this institution shall be maintained—and there are certainly arguments in favor of its maintenance—yet at the same time the results of this institution do not begin to compare in magnitude and in importance and educational power with the other great educational institutions of the country.

I think you create a sentiment of unrest and of discontent when by the acts of your Government you place a few men capable of teaching on a far higher plane of compensation than that which is obtained by accomplished scholars at the head of the other great institutions of the country. And I must say to gentlemen we are not acting the part of public benefactors when we present a motive for that unrest, that discontent, that sentiment of injustice which must prevail in your great private institutions of learning when you maintain an institution where the compensation for scholarly attainments is so far above that which is paid in the other great educational institutions of the country.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS], to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. THOMAS. I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amendment which I withdrew was merely formal. There is a motion pending, as I understand, to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That was withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I renew it.

Mr. ELLIS. I submit that the gentleman from Indiana is too late.

Mr. RANDALL. I would remark to the gentleman from Indiana that there is no use in striking out the paragraph unless there is a clause added to the bill repealing the existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no disposition on the part of the Chair to take advantage of any gentleman. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] states he was not aware the motion to strike out the paragraph was withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdrew my amendment, which was merely formal. I did not notice the fact that the gentleman from Illinois withdrew the motion to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana renew that motion?

Mr. BEACH. I submit that whether the gentleman from Indiana was aware or not of the fact that the motion to strike out was withdrawn, that motion was withdrawn, and the Clerk had begun to read the next paragraph. It is too late, therefore, for the gentleman to renew the motion to strike out.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] if that paragraph should be stricken out all that is necessary is to add to this bill the proviso repealing the provision of the law that persons employed in a perfectly civil employment shall receive in addition to their large compensation this additional item of $8,000 or $9,000 on the military theory of longevity of service.

Mr. RANDALL. My remark was made as a suggestion to the gentleman from Indiana that if he desired to strike out this paragraph that should be accompanied by a clause repealing the existing law, which would be in order, I suppose, if offered at the proper part of the bill.

Mr. BEACH. What disposition has the Chair made of my point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has overruled it.

Mr. ELLIS. I move to strike out the last word. I do not think that either $3,600 or $4,500 a year, the lowest and highest compensation received by these professors and soldiers, is too much. Why, sir, that is the salary of a head doorkeeper in a great commercial house. It amounts to the ordinary perquisites or fees of a lawyer with an average country practice.

Who and what are these men? They are the guardians morally and intellectually of the men who handle our armies. They are those selected to train the men who are to be our pilots and our strong arms in the hour of national trouble. This is the one great governmental institution for that purpose.

Who and what are we? A nation of 50,000,000 of people, claiming to be the most intelligent in the world, claiming to be the wealthiest people in the world, with a small Army of but a handful of men, and in case of war obliged to rely upon the rapid training of volunteers. For that purpose we must look to this national nursery.

These men do not get too much pay, three hundred or three hundred and fifty dollars a month, in addition to their soldier's pay. They are obliged to incur a great many expenses which they do not have to incur when in the field. They are obliged to entertain people from almost every quarter of the Union. They are compelled to receive and entertain and do entertain the friends of the students whom we send there. They are obliged to maintain a condition in life and a habit of expenditure which they are not required to maintain in the field.

This increased pay which we give them is not too much. In fact I would rather vote for its increase than for its diminution, because its increase would be more commensurate to their deserts and more consistent and in keeping with our position among the nations of the earth.

I am tired of this two-bit economy. I do not believe that you can run this great Government on 75 cents a year. I believe in properly paying these instructors of our youth, in keeping up the morale of West Point, and in making it the most efficient institution of the kind in the world. I believe in keeping up its great prestige and reputation not only in our own midst but in the eyes and estimation of the people of the whole world.

The gentleman undertakes to compare it with ordinary institutions that are obliged to depend for the pay of their professors upon what they receive from their patronage and the endowments of charity. No such comparison should be made. This is the great institution of the American people, the one institution which has given us a long line of men who have inwreathed our flag with victories—Scott and Taylor, Grant and Hancock, Sherman and Sheridan, Thomas and McClellan, Slocum and Rosecrans, Sumner and Franklin, Sedgwick and Kearny, Burnside and Meade. Sir, the sky of our history is studded with the bright constellations of names of men educated at this institution. By their services these men of West Point have far more than repaid you for the moneys that have been expended upon that institution.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS].

Mr. ELLIS. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman can not withdraw it, I believe, after I have the floor. I renew it, if the gentleman does withdraw it.

The gentleman from Louisiana has mentioned some very great names in our history, names that excite the pride of every American. Could he not also mention, in connection with the great names made illustrious by our wars—happily for this country the period of its existence has been mainly one of peace, for the grand purpose of this Republic has been to secure the blessings of peace—a great multitude of names made equally illustrious in the employments of peace?

Mr. ELLIS. We have had one war in every sixteen years of our existence.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will not the gentleman also call over the great names that have adorned the history of this country in times of peace, and compare them with the great names that have adorned it in times of war? If he will do that, how would he find the account to stand? Let him compare the great names who have entered upon the great theater of life from Harvard and Princeton and Brown and other great institutions of this country with the great names of West Point and see the result. Let him enumerate the men who by the arts of peace have inspired and elevated the whole people of this country and given it the high standing which it occupies throughout the world; who have contributed to achievements in times of peace to make this the first nation upon the face of God's green earth.

Mr. ELLIS. Will the gentleman tell the House what his salary is?

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the gentleman consider those institutions which have given character and position and honor to this country far beyond what all the influences, the powers of war, can give to this nation in its relations with the world. My friend says that these men should be paid handsome salaries, because this institution at West Point is more important than others, more important than Harvard, more important than Brown, more important than Princeton. Would such be the judgment the people of this country would pronounce upon these various institutions of learning?

This institution at West Point is maintained simply from the necessity of the case. It is at best but a precautionary measure—a precedent precaution—a point around which the nation may rally in its hours of adversity. The other institutions, colleges, universities, and, more important and grander than all, the great university of the nation, your systems of common schools lift up the whole body of our people in their general advancement to a higher plane of social as well as political life.

In paying these West Point professors enormously higher salaries than are paid to professors in our great institutions of learning which rest upon public faith and public affection, which rest upon the arts of peace, we are making larger payments for the encouragement of war which destroys than for peace which elevates humanity; and this does not become the American Congress, for the office of a republic is not the elevation of the few but the ennobling of all by the blessings and arts of peace.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, in the remarks I made a few moments ago I did not wish to be understood as intimating that the professors and officers employed at this institution are receiving too much pay. I have never been justly catalogued with that class of so-called statesmen who believe in running the Government on 75 cents a year, as suggested by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS]. But I believe in fair, open, direct legislation. If these professors are not receiving sufficient compensation in the amount which they are allowed as pay, let us increase it to such sum as may be right and proper—such sum as will give them an ample and honorable compensation. But I dislike this indirection; this paying them in chips and whetstones—this paying them so much as salary, so much as longevity pay, so much additional pay as adjutant, so much as professor of artillery, &c.

Let us say how much those officers shall receive, and let us appropriate it in one sum, so that we can meet the question of their compensation squarely, face to face. It is not the amount I object to; it is not so much the end as the means. I do not want to see the pay of these professors made up of several items that the people do not understand. They may very naturally inquire, "Why this item? Why that? Why not pay these men so much in a round sum?"

I withdrew my amendment because I was afraid if it should be adopted the pay of these men would be cut down, and that is not what I am after. What I want is to have the whole compensation of each professor put into one item, as, for instance, professor of mathematics, $4,000, $5,000, $6,000 if necessary. I am willing to pay liberal salaries to the officers who have charge of this institution and who are sending out into the country young men who in the past have proved an honor to the nation and a safe reliance in its hour of danger.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pro forma amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw it.

Mr. KEIFER. I renew the amendment, although I am anxious to reach a vote, for the purpose of saying a single word.

I repeat that to strike out this clause of the bill would cause a deficiency in the coming fiscal year. These officers who have served for a period of ten years or more are given by section 1336 of the Revised Statutes longevity pay or pay by virtue of increased rank. This is given by statute; and the Committee on Appropriations decided that it was their duty to report a bill making appropriations in accordance with law. The policy has prevailed of paying officers of the Army, and sometimes soldiers, on the basis of length of service, the pay increasing every five years or ten years, &c. This policy has prevailed, so far as I know, throughout the entire history of the country. It is a policy fixed by law, and is doubtless wise. But if it is not wise let it be corrected through the instrumentality of our appropriate committee, and let a proper policy be adopted which will fix a definite pay for officers, with or without regard to length of service.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. However politic the principle of longevity pay may be with reference to military employment, employment connected with war, does the gentleman from Ohio think that, in a purely civil employment, such as a professorship of a college, the principle of longevity pay should prevail? Is there the same reason for it in this civil employment as in military life? Does the principle prevail in any other civil employment in this country?

Mr. KEIFER. I did not yield for a speech, especially one which treats these professors as engaged simply in a civil employment. They are military professors at a military institution, where they instruct cadets in all the duties of soldiers in the different branches of service—engineer, cavalry, artillery, infantry. This is not strictly civil employment. Professors could not be obtained from civil life competent to serve in these positions. These professors must be trained and skilled officers. The present superintendent of the institution has not only all the skill which can be obtained by the training of the schools, but he is skilled on the battlefield as a great tactician.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] withdraw the pro forma amendment?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN to strike out the paragraph, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For department of natural and experimental philosophy: For additions to apparatus to illustrate the laws of acoustics, optics, and mechanics, $1,000; books of reference, text-books, stationery, materials, and repairs, $400; for pay of mechanic assistant, $1,000; construction of quarters near the new observatory for the mechanic assistant, $3,800; in all, $6,200.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise a point of order on that part of the paragraph which provides for "construction of quarters near the new observatory for the mechanic assistant, $3,800."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is that it is new legislation.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. There is one point of order already pending.

Mr. BELFORD. I can not hear a word of what the Clerk is reading or what gentlemen are saying on the other side. At this end of the Hall we can not hear the point of order raised by the gentleman from Indiana, and I insist on my right to hear what is going on here.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will state, in support of my point of order, that this item was submitted as a separate item in the estimates. It is a new and independent item.

Mr. BELFORD. I can not hear what is going on.

The CHAIRMAN. It is impossible to hear what is going on. Gentlemen will resume their seats and cease conversation.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is an entirely new work, not authorized by any law heretofore enacted.

Mr. CALKINS. What is the provision on which the point of order is made?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Construction of quarters near the new observatory for the mechanic-assistant, $3,800.

Mr. KEIFER. If I understand the point of order raised by the gentleman from Indiana, it is that this is new legislation not authorized by any specific statute. Then everything in the way of repairs, putting new shingles on the roof, having porches, making any sort of improvement or repair of the institution, would not be in order unless provided for by a previous special statute.

It is said this proposes the construction of a new building. That is not in any sense true. This merely provides for the construction at the observatory of quarters for the mechanic-assistant.

It must be borne in mind that some years ago that observatory at the Military Academy was removed on account of the railroad going through there. There was an arrangement made by which the old observatory was torn down and a new one constructed. This new structure stands exposed, away from any protection, and as being of advantage, and indeed as essentially necessary to its care and preservation, it is reported here by the proper officers there, by the superintendent, by the War Department, that it is necessary and essential to have this structure for a mechanic-assistant. This is in the nature of an improvement and addition to the observatory itself, and it is not new legislation. It is not specifically provided for by law, but it is, as I have said, essentially necessary to the buildings already there.

Mr. CALKINS. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to ask whether this provision is inserted for the purpose of finishing an observatory which was begun in lieu of one destroyed by the construction of a railroad through the grounds of the academy?

Mr. KEIFER. That is the case. It is not so much the construction of an observatory proper as it is a structure connected with it for convenience, to be occupied by a skilled mechanic, who is known as a mechanic-assistant, to take charge of the delicate instruments which are in the building, and to be on hand whenever necessary for their adjustment.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman permit me a moment?

Mr. KEIFER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RANDALL. The question before the committee, I wish to say, is not one of necessity. It is simply whether it is or is not subject to the point of order which has been made against it. Now, we might as well call things by their right names. This is a proposition not to build an addition to the observatory but to build a home, or a residence, for one of the officers who has charge of the observatory; but it is a question rather of convenience or distance—where he shall live—than of anything else. It is not directed or warranted or authorized by any statute that I have seen; certainly not to build a residence. And I repeat, it is not in the nature of an attachment to the observatory except as a matter of convenience for one of the persons who has charge of that institution.

Mr. BEACH. I would like, Mr. Chairman, to state by way of supplement to what the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania has said, and in connection with the necessity for this building, that this observatory is at some distance from the other buildings on the Government reservation at that point. There are some very valuable instruments in this observatory, and they have to be used frequently in the night-time; and in order to use them it becomes necessary that this mechanic-assistant should be present to aid the officers in pointing the telescopes, in adjusting the delicate machinery, and in getting the instruments in proper shape for making astronomical observations. The superintendent of that institution, with a view of having this mechanic-assistant present at all hours of the day or night, whenever his services are needed, has recommended that a residence be constructed close to the observatory, where he can be found and where he will be accessible at all hours. There is no other object in view in the construction of this residence than that this assistant shall be in a position to see that these instruments are not injured or their value destroyed; that no one shall break into the building in the night-time. It is a matter of precaution for their preservation and protection more than anything else.

I find in the Book of Estimates which we have received, among the items referring to this matter, a note, in which it is stated that for the care and preservation of these valuable instruments ——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman from New York that this debate is not as to the necessity of this appropriation, but whether under existing law its construction is warranted.

Mr. BEACH. We admit that there is no technical provision of the law which warrants it; but it has been recommended, it is essential, and it is reported by the Committee on Appropriations, who recommend its passage.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no controversy about the recommendation. The simple question is whether there is a statute authorizing the expenditure. I would like to have the gentleman from Louisiana point out a statute which does authorize it.

Mr. ELLIS. I have sent for the original act establishing this institution at West Point. I have not yet received it, but will call the gentleman's attention to the law as soon as it comes. I imagine, however, that the Government in establishing the institution provided by statute for all necessary buildings. I take that for granted. I know as a matter of history that buildings have been created there from time to time, as their need was developed, without any special legislation. The general power which is given by the organic act—the act organizing the Military Academy at West Point—to construct the necessary buildings will cover this whole question, and as soon as the law for which I have sent is at hand I think it will fully bear out that position. I know, Mr. Chairman, as a matter of common sense, as a matter of judgment, that the act organizing the West Point school did certainly provide for constructing the necessary buildings; and we all know as I have said, for it is a matter of history, that they have been built from time to time, and that too without the passage of a special statute for such construction.

But what are the facts in this case? The Government has ordered recently the construction of a new observatory at that point. There are, as my friend from New York says, very valuable and delicate instruments in that observatory, instruments that have cost a great deal of money, and the building in which they are stored is a half mile or more away from the other buildings of the institution. They are exposed night and day to theft or injury. The building is exposed to being broken into and these valuable instruments damaged or stolen. Now the professors simply ask that this residence for the mechanic-assistant shall be constructed in close proximity to the observatory, in order that these instruments may not only be protected from injury, but that this man who has charge of the repairs and the management of the delicate machinery connected with these instruments may be on hand at all times to keep them in order and adjust them and always convenient to assist the professors in their operations. It is a matter of economy that this building shall be constructed.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no danger of the building being broken into. The whole institution with all of its outlying buildings is under proper guard night and day, so that that question should not weigh with the committee.

Mr. ROSECRANS. But let me say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the danger is that these delicate instruments, which have to be kept in proper order by a mechanical expert competent to do it, are liable to serious injury by neglect or in the hands of persons unaccustomed to use them. It is important, therefore, that the assistant in charge of them should be at hand at all times.

Mr. RANDALL. But this is a mere question whether this construction is authorized by law; whether there is any provision in the law warranting the construction of this residence. If there is I would like to see it.

Mr. ELLIS. I was told by the chairman of the subcommittee, who prepared this bill last year, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], that he did not put in this item because the observatory had not been completed. He describes the position as a lonely one, away from the barracks, and the building liable to be broken into and these instruments damaged or stolen. We do not want to erect a shanty or a hut.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman from Louisiana point out the law which authorizes the construction of this observatory?

Mr. ELLIS. Of this observatory? I do not understand the inquiry of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this a part of the institution itself that is authorized by law? Or is this structure necessary for the occupants who are to take care of the observatory?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The question to which the Chair desires an answer is whether the act authorizing the establishment of this observatory is broad enough to cover this particular structure?

Mr. ELLIS. The original observatory was destroyed, a railroad company having built a tunnel under it. They did that with the permission of the Government on condition that they would build another observatory. The railroad company have built that at their own expense, and this building is an addendum to that observatory.

Mr. KEIFER. The Secretary of War in his estimates, as well as the superintendent, speaks of this structure as being as essential as any other portion of the building. He says the assistant should be there every hour of the day and night in order to the maintenance and protection of the observatory. It is as much essential to have him as it is to have instruments; and therefore this structure, which is merely intended for the accommodation of the mechanic-assistant, must be classed as belonging to the observatory.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think the discussion of the merits is proper on the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. But the discussion of the merits to some extent is necessary to enable the chairman to know what the proposition is.

Mr. HOLMAN. This mechanic referred to has accommodations elsewhere; but it is more convenient for him to be nearer the observatory.

Mr. ELLIS. How does the gentleman know that?

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman is trying to correct me by giving his own explanation when I am attempting to explain what is the fact. It is necessary for this assistant to be where his duties require him to be every hour of the day and night. I submit that the clause is in order under the general law which authorizes the keeping up of whatever is essential.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think the paragraph is in order, the structure being necessary to the institution. But if there is any doubt about it the Chair is willing to submit the question to the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I want to say a word in that connection, if the Chair will allow me. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] says the building occupied by this mechanic is about two miles away. The Chair must see at once this is a mere question of the convenience of an officer of that establishment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is impossible for the Chair to determine the fact as to distance. The bill does not disclose that fact. It simply says the structure is to be a residence for a mechanic-assistant, and the Chair must presume that it is in close proximity to the observatory, close enough to enable that assistant to discharge his duties. The Chair can only rule on what appears on the face of the bill itself, that this is a structure for the convenience of a mechanic employed at that institution to take care of the observatory; and the Chair is inclined to hold that the clause is in order. But as it may be considered a doubtful question, the Chair would like to take the sense of the committee on the point of order.

Mr. ELLIS. Does the Chair refer the matter to the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the clause is in order. But if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] desires to take an appeal, the Chair will submit that appeal to the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. If that is in order, everything else is in order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. Chairman, the Speaker of the last House of Representatives, as is the duty of the Speaker every year, appointed a board of visitors to visit West Point to examine into the workings of the institution and to examine the character of the buildings and to make their suggestions to Congress. I hold in my hand the report of the Board of Visitors. They have examined, it seems, very carefully the whole workings of the Military Academy and the condition of the buildings, and they recommended what improvements should be made, stating also their views as to what other buildings should be erected. This report fails to say a single word about the necessity of putting up a house, costing $3,800, in order to accommodate the family of a mechanic-assistant of the observatory. There is not a single word about that in the report of the visitors, which is signed by General Rodgers, the president of the board; General Dayton, the secretary of the board; General Arnold, General Schuyler, General Crosby, General Whitman, General Howard, General Potter, General French, and on the part of the House by Mr. GEORGE W. STEELE, the gentleman from Indiana; Mr. Amos Townsend of Ohio, and Mr. W. A. J. Sparks of Illinois, both members of the last Congress, who are gentlemen of intelligence and excellent judgment. This Board of Visitors, after going through that entire establishment, failed to see any necessity for a building for the mechanic-assistant.

The Book of Estimates of last year shows that an estimate was made for this very building. They said then that $2,000 was sufficient to build a home for this mechanic. But this year it seems they have concluded to furnish more respectable quarters and have added $1,800. If $2,000 was sufficient last year to build a home for this mechanic, why is it not sufficient this year?

Mr. BEACH. Labor and material are higher.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If the Democratic party intends to adhere to its past record of economy and retrenchment, I wish to see some symptoms of that intention manifested now upon this floor.

If a Republican Congress refused to appropriate even $2,000 for such a building, how can you come in here and demand at the hands of the Democratic party that we shall appropriate $3,800 to build a residence for a mechanic-assistant? I am willing to concede that this mechanic is perhaps a skilled mechanic, not unskilled in knowledge of these instruments. But it seems to me that a building of much less pretensions than this might be sufficient for him.

Another remark I desire to make. My friend from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] puts his advocacy of this appropriation upon the ground that it is necessary to have some one to guard these instruments. You can get a watchman to guard these instruments who would be content with a house that would cost $500, if that is all you wish, to have a house for a watchman. It does seem to me that this is rather aristocratic quarters to erect for a watchman to guard these instruments.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELLIS. I am a little surprised that the friend of the people, the man of all others who is the friend of the people, who is always speaking for the people, should hiss the word "mechanic" out of his lips and lower his voice as if he were ashamed of it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman never heard such an expression from me.

Mr. ELLIS. I appeal not to the memory merely, but to the living impression of every member who heard him, if that word "mechanic" was not hissed out of his lips as if it were a thing which ought not to be mentioned here. Has the gentleman any idea of what sort of a mechanic this is?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. You say he is a watchman.

Mr. ELLIS. He is not a mere jack-plane carpenter; not even a blacksmith. I have no doubt the gentleman has had friendly and social intercourse with all the blacksmiths in his district, patting them on the back and telling them there never were such fine fellows. [Laughter.]

This is a man of science, an educated man, a man who understands all the delicate and intricate machinery with which these great instruments of science are built. He is a man who knows how to arrange them, how to prepare them, how to clean them, to fix them up for the operations of the professors. That is the kind of a mechanic-assistant he is.

The reason why this appropriation was not put in the bill of last year was explained to me by the gentleman who prepared the bill, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. He said that he did not put it in the bill because at that time the observatory had not been completed.

The gentleman says that he wants to put a five-hundred-dollar hut there. That would be a beautiful ornament for the grounds of West Point, a lovely ornament for those grounds.

The gentleman cannot deter me or any sensible man on this side of the House who believes he represents a great country from voting for this appropriation by bringing in here partisan politics. West Point is my institution as well as yours. It is the institution of the people of Louisiana as it is the institution of the people of New York. I feel with them a common pride in its glory, its perpetuity, its power, and its usefulness. I say that this building should be put up, and it should be a building that will be ornamental as well as useful on those grounds.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to strike out the last word. I say that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS], laboring man as he is, and, perhaps, ever has been, has no more respect or reverence for the laboring classes of this country than their humble servant who now addresses the House. I came up from the ranks and have carved my way by my own skill and labor. I honor and reverence the laboring man, be he a common blacksmith in my own Congressional district or a mechanic-assistant at West Point.

Mr. ELLIS. I accept the gentleman's disclaimer.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What I object to is that while the blacksmiths of his district and my own occupy humble log cabins, perhaps humbler abodes than that, he should come in here and vote to tax them for the purpose of building aristocratic quarters for a mechanic-assistant at West Point costing $3,800. I object to the wasteful, extravagant, and unnecessary expenditure of the hard earnings of the mechanics of his own district and of mine. That is the ground of my opposition to this clause in this bill.

And I want to state one further fact while I am on the floor. I want to challenge that gentleman to show wherein the superintendent of the academy at West Point has indorsed or recommended this appropriation; and wherein the Secretary of War has recommended that an appropriation of $3,800 be made in order to furnish a residence for a mechanic-assistant at West Point.

Mr. ELLIS. I accept the challenge.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I know without any explanation what the gentleman will do. There is in this Book of Estimates a letter from the professor in charge of this establishment recommending this appropriation, as he did in the last Congress. But neither the Secretary of War nor the superintendent of the Military Academy has recommended it.

Mr. ELLLIS. The superintendent does recommend it, and the Secretary of War recommends it by his indorsement.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do not interrupt me. I know that the superintendent of the academy calls attention to the recommendations of the professor in charge of that bureau, but he does not recommend that the appropriation shall be made.

Mr. BEACH. How does it get into the Book of Estimates?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not care who recommends it; I am opposed to the use of the people's money unnecessarily and extravagantly in this way.

Mr. HUNT. Mr. Chairman, I have been surprised to hear the reasons urged by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, Mr. TOWNSHEND of Illinois, in opposition to the erection of this building. There are at least a number of gentlemen on the floor who know what an observatory is. In order that an observatory may be operated it is not only necessary that there should be skilled mechanical assistance, but that it should be at hand in time of need. How can a skilled mechanical assistant be of avail unless he be present during the night or at the only time when his services can be of any use? And this is the very ground upon which the recommendation for the appropriation under consideration is based. I read from the Book of Estimates:

NOTE.—By the Professor.—"I consider it extremely necessary, for the care and preservation of the valuable astronomical apparatus, to have a thoroughly competent assistant located as near as possible to the observatory. His presence may be needed at any hour of the night, and certain observations about to be taken may require his constant attention at intervals during the night. There is no house near the observatory which can be had for his residence. An appropriation was asked for last year, but not granted."

The superintendent of the Military Academy invites special attention to the necessity of the construction of the quarters for the mechanic-assistant at the new observatory, as set forth in the remarks of the professor.

Are you going to have an observatory and remove from it the only person whose services can make it available? Are you going to have an observatory and close its doors just at the time the stars are to be seen in the skies? Are you going to have somebody to call the astronomer at the time it is necessary for him to be on duty?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. How did they get on for eighty years without such a building?

Mr. HUNT. The academy can not get along without it, because the purposes of scientific observation can not be accomplished without it. Would the gentleman have this House believe that this building, which is to cost the inconsiderable sum now proposed, is to be a palatial structure? Is any sum, Mr. Chairman, too great to be spent in the interests of science, in giving skilled mechanical aid for the prosecution of these great astronomical studies? Is any sum wastefully disposed of if expended at this great Military Academy in explorations of the wide domain of scientific knowledge? The expenditure is in the interests of science and scientific investigation; nor is the House to be shocked at the proposed outlay of $3,800 when recommended as it is by responsible men, skilled instructors, who know the price of materials from personal investigation, and who testify on their honor that the sum is required.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, if necessary, I move, pro forma, to strike out the last word. The question of the erection of this building was very carefully investigated by the Committee on Appropriations; and the item was retained, not unanimously, but by the vote of a large majority of the committee; and I am astounded to hear my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] still insisting upon striking out this item, for the building is certainly needed for the good management of the institution. And the gentleman gives the strangest reason in the world for his opposition. As I understood him, it is because there are log houses in his district [laughter] and because he was born in one. Am I mistaken? I would like to ask the gentleman whether he lives in a log house now? Why does he live in a better house than a log house?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not know that I am to be subjected to cross-examination by the gentleman. When he finishes his remarks I may perhaps reply, if I deem them worthy of reply.

Mr. HORR. I shall be very happy to have the gentleman explain his position at any time. Now, I assume that he does not live in a log house, because he can afford a better one. I submit that it is every man's privilege to move out of a log house into a better one when he can afford to do so. This nation, being able to build something better than a log house for our chief mechanic at West Point, ought to erect a respectable building—a good frame house. If we were not able to build anything else than a log house, I should vote for a log house; but I think as a nation we can afford to erect a good, comfortable, frame building for the purposes contemplated in the provision of the bill.

I have the advantage probably of the gentleman from Illinois, for I was reared in a log house myself, and I have the greatest respect for such houses; but at the same time I think his objections, so common upon matters of this kind, are simply frivolous. There is an attempt on his part all the time to higgle about little items in our appropriation bills, for fear that there may be somewhere an item not exactly in harmony with his customary toot that we hear daily about "economy."

There is no real economy in constructing a building for the benefit of the Government except it be such a one as is proper for the object for which it is built. If to-morrow the Treasury building in this city should be destroyed, I take it that my friend from Illinois would not be in favor of removing the Treasury into a log cabin, but he would be in favor of building a substantial stone house, perhaps even better than the one we now have—wouldn't you? Of course you would.

This building we propose in this bill is modest, moderate, such a one as the institution demands. As a Representative of the people you will find they never object to any appropriation where it does not go beyond what good business men would do if they were constructing it for themselves. This bill does not go beyond that. This appropriation, I submit to my friend, is not for any better building than he would build under the circumstances if he were running it as a private institution. It will not cost a dollar more than you would put into it. It is based on good business principles, and I submit to the House we ought to stop these frivolous amendments and try to get through this bill during the lifetime of the present members of that institution. [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Why did not the Board of Visitors recommend it last year?

Mr. KEIFER. I do not wish to prolong the debate, as the House is well advised of the merits of the pending proposition. But it must not be allowed to pass by without noticing a remark of the gentleman from Illinois that the present superintendent of the Military Academy does not recommend the structure. The language of the Secretary of War used in the Book of Estimates is that—

> The superintendent of the Military Academy invites special attention to the necessity for the construction of quarters for mechanic-assistant at the new observatory, as set forth in the estimates of the professor.

He invites special attention to the necessity of it, and yet the gentleman from Illinois interprets that language to mean that he is not in favor of it. I will leave it to gentlemen to say.

The professor tells us there is necessity for it, as has been stated by the gentleman from Louisiana. I hold in my hand a letter from Professor Michie, in which he says:

> The item for quarters for the assistant, to be built near the observatory, has been carefully estimated, to furnish a neat frame building suitable for a small family. If it is granted it will give me the following advantages: First. I can get the services of a most excellent man, who is the best instrument-maker in the country. For the past ten years he has been employed to make some of the best apparatus now in our laboratories. I can not secure his services unless I have some place to put him.

It must be remembered since the new observatory has been constructed no provision has been made for such a person as an assistant-mechanic. In the old observatory it was provided for, but has not been provided in the new. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. TOWNSHEND's amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Line 113, page 6, insert these words:
> "Additions to the astronomical transit-circle for new observatory, $1,875.
> "Strike out total stated in lines 113 and 114 and insert in lieu thereof $8,075."

Mr. ROSECRANS. In explanation of that amendment, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the new observatory is intended to accomplish a great deal more work than the old observatory. It was used for instruction of the class in astronomy before, whereas the observatory now contributes to the general fund of astronomical knowledge by being used day and night for that purpose. Hence the necessity for the provision already adopted.

I wish to say that the astronomical telescope which we have paid for, and which is there, can not be used without the transit-circle and appliances, and the question before this committee is, shall this item be omitted until some future day or shall we make provision for it here, so that this instrument shall not remain unused? I repeat, Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact the astronomical telescope can not be used for any purpose for which it is built until we have the transit-circle and appliances attached thereto.

Several members of the committee with whom I have conferred have informed me that they were not aware of the fact that this had to be laid by and is useless until this expenditure is provided, and I understand that they will not object to the proposition.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire not to continue this discussion, for I am not opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from California and hope it will be adopted. In support of his amendment I ask the Clerk now to read a paragraph from a letter of Professor Michie.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before that I wish to ask the gentleman if this item is embraced in the estimates.

Mr. KEIFER. It has been estimated for.

Mr. HOLMAN. In the regular Book of Estimates?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; it will be found in the regular Book of Estimates. I now ask the Clerk to read the extract from the letter of Professor Michie.

The Clerk read as follows:

> The other item is to get the necessary adjunct to the meridian transit-circle. This is the most important instrument of the observatory. We use it daily in time determinations. The culminating apparatus is essential to set our instrument and to know its errors of adjustment. The transit-circle will not be ready to set up in the observatory until next September, but this will be needed at the same time, and as each comes in the next fiscal year I have to apply for it now. Without it our transit-circle must lie idle; and until Congress sees fit to grant it I wish to show General KEIFER that these are not unnecessary nor improper nor useless requests, but of real necessity.

Mr. KEIFER. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I hope Congress will adopt this amendment. I regard it as very important. I am informed also by a gentleman very familiar with this institution at West Point that this is very necessary and that the observations can not be properly taken or properly utilized without this provision. I hope there will be no opposition to its adoption.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

> For department of drawing: For fifteen new desks, $150; photographic slides for use in lectures, repairs and construction of racks, models, stretchers, stools and desks, stationery, drawing materials, cardboard for mounting drawings, tacks, hammers and contingencies, books of reference (mechanical, architectural, surveying, geometry, and art), periodicals on art and technology, models for topographical, free-hand, and constructive drawing, hectograph, rules and triangles, shades, rollers, and contingencies, for enlargement of drawing academy, $810; in all, $960.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to call the attention of the committee for a moment to what is merely a formal correction which should be made in this paragraph. In line 129, after the word "triangle," I think in order to convey the idea the committee had in view the words "and for" should be inserted before the word "shades;" and in line 130 the comma after the word "contingencies" should be stricken out; so that it will read "and contingencies for enlargement of drawing academy."

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

> For expenses of the Board of Visitors, including mileage, $3,000.

Mr. MCADOO. I wish to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amend line 159 by striking out the word "three" and inserting the word "one."

Mr. MCADOO. The object of my amendment, Mr. Chairman, is to provide that the expenditures of the Board of Visitors to West Point should be reduced from $3,000 to $1,000. As I understand it, sir, this Board of Visitors consists of three members of the House of Representatives, appointed by the Speaker, and three Senators, appointed by the President of the Senate, together with various other appointees on the part of the President of the United States, not exceeding ten in all. I can not conceive how the expenses of these gentlemen in their attendance at West Point for the longest possible period, probably not exceeding three days, can reach the sum of $3,000.

I do not offer this, Mr. Chairman, as a factious amendment. I do not want to higgle over the expenses connected with a useful and necessary institution like West Point. But I fear that there are some truths in the remarks recently made by the illustrious gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] when he said that this institution has degenerated into a hot-bed of snobbery, instead of being democratic, democratic-republican, republican, in keeping with the character and traditions of our people. As I understand it, the real fact is that this Board of Visitors go there and indulge in a fancy ball; and this ball, if a good ball, is no doubt a very wholesome recreation; but unfortunately it, too, has degenerated into a vicious social system, and become a matrimonial market to which aspiring mothers bring their giddy daughters and palm them off on these unfortunate young men, handicapping them for life and destroying their usefulness not only to themselves but to their country. [Laughter.]

Now, members of this House who are appointed on this committee are paid a salary by the Government. The members of the Senate who are appointed as visitors to West Point on this board also receive a fixed salary from the Government. I think $1,000 will take these gentlemen to West Point and entertain them in a respectable manner for three days or less.

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BELFORD. If it is proper I wish to offer a further amendment to the amendment which has been suggested.

It costs about $15 to go from here to West Point, including a bottle of champagne. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAYO. Let me ask the gentleman if he will furnish me a ticket over and back and a bottle of champagne at that price?

Mr. BELFORD. Yes, sir; I will furnish you a ticket and the champagne both for that price.

I had occasion to go over to New York this year with a distinguished gentleman on this side of the House who desired to visit West Point. We both had the honor of paying our railroad fare. [Laughter.] We spent one night in the city of Philadelphia and the next day we went on to New York. I went to the Fifth Avenue Hotel, where I stopped and he went up to this Military Academy, and I think when we got back home the total of our expenses did not exceed the sum of $150.

Here is an appropriation of $3,000 to buy kid gloves, patent-leather shoes, swallow-tail coats, and ruffled shirts for the distinguished Democratic Representatives who will naturally be sent there by the Speaker of this House. The only consideration that will induce me to vote for this paragraph is that it will assist in opening up the vaults of the national Treasury. [Laughter.] This is the only indication of generosity that I have seen exhibited since this House has assembled.

What a grand and magnificent opportunity this paragraph offers to the distinguished statesman from Indiana—I refer to my friend Mr. HOLMAN. Why did he not rise in his seat like Aphrodite from the sea, and posing upon the crest of its foam, declare, "I object?"

This is the place wherein to plant the roots of economy in reference to this Board of Visitors. This is an institution as to which you should "bind an economical spirit to your bosom with bands of iron."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. BELFORD. Is my time up already? [Laughter.]

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I do not rise particularly for the purpose of discussing the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey, but I think this is a proper occasion to treat with some gravity a line of comment which has been indulged in upon this floor with reference to an institution of learning that has been most useful to the Republic.

I wish to say a word with reference to the criticisms which were first indulged in by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB], having reference to the examination held in that institution. The complaint was made here that the examinations were too rigid; and my colleague from New York [Mr. COX] observed that the ingenuous youth of the country were frightened by the examinations. These criticisms related almost entirely to the mathematical studies.

I have had occasion within a month to make a nomination to West Point, and in that connection I made an examination into the conditions required of candidates. And I have to say there is no institution of learning in the United States of collegiate grade which requires so little in the mental qualifications and attainments of candidates as does West Point. The requirement in mathematics is that a boy shall be able to do sums in arithmetic and problems in algebra to equations of the second degree—a requirement quite within the compass of any lad of sixteen who has been carefully grounded in those studies. The mathematical requirement at Yale represents, in my judgment, a full year of additional study when compared with the mathematical requirement at West Point; and the mathematical requirement at Harvard, I think every person who makes the examination will admit, would represent two years of additional study in comparison with the mathematical requirement at West Point.

But let me say to gentlemen on this floor that there is a way in which any man dissatisfied with the result of an examination can have perfect satisfaction. Let him send for the examination papers. They are all preserved there, and any member of the House who thinks his candidate has not had fair treatment may send for the examination papers and see how well or how poorly the candidate did.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. ELLIS obtained the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. DORSHEIMER.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I have an instance in my mind which came to my own knowledge a few days ago of a complaint being made to the distinguished officer now at the head of the naval school. It was stated to him, "Why, this youth who was sent up for examination was one of the cleverest of the young men of our community." Admiral Worden replied, "I will send for the examination papers." And when the examination papers were presented and this gentleman saw what sort of an examination his own son had passed he was obliged to say that he was content with the decision of the examining board of the school.

Besides, let it be known that none of these examinations are oral. Boys are not brought up before a stern professor and frightened out of their wits. The examinations are deliberately conducted. The boy is at his desk and he makes his answers on paper. But no boy is rejected at West Point or at the Naval Academy without having an additional opportunity. His attention is called to his deficiencies, and before he is sent back to his home he has a second examination.

There have been observations made on this floor still more offensive. It has been said that snobbery rules at West Point. I am sorry that such an observation should have been made by my colleague; and if he were here I should advise him when he next makes that observation to do it to the face of the men whom he insults and not under the protection of this House.

Snobbery at West Point! There can be no one here sufficiently acquainted with the facts who will not bear me out in my statement that the life at West Point is simply such as befits the discipline of a school where soldiers are taught the profession of arms.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] made a comparison between the results achieved by the education at West Point and the results achieved at our older and larger institutions of learning. I say to my distinguished friend that West Point has no occasion to fear that comparison. She has furnished her full contribution to the literature of the country and more than her full contribution to the science of the country. She has not only furnished officers in war, but in all the mechanical arts and in all the splendid achievements made in peace in this country; in the construction of railways and the other great public works of this generation West Point has done more than her full share. If we come to public office, there are at least four men members of this House, to my own knowledge, who graduated from West Point. And in all the departments of civil life, when one considers how many of them remain bound to a profession which prohibits them from entering civil life, it is remarkable what a large proportion of them have won success in every peaceful avocation.

Although it may be that, young member as I am, I might better have left the discussion of such a subject as this to those more experienced in the business of Congress, still I have risen to enter my protest against this kind of criticism, and to bear my testimony to the manner in which both in peace as well as in war the graduates of the institution at West Point have shown that they deserve well of the country which has given them their education.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO].

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For reflooring academic building, including fencing academy, $2,580.
For reflooring cadet barracks and piazza, $2,420.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to strike out the last word, merely to make one or two remarks There have been several attempts in this debate to cast odium on the efforts of those of us who have sought to reduce the appropriations in this bill to what we believe is necessary and proper. It therefore may be appropriate for me to reply to some of those observations.

The two items of appropriations just read by the Clerk have been asked for each year for four or five years past, and in every instance they have been refused. During the last Congress the Republican majority refused to make an appropriation for the purpose of reflooring these buildings. I made an investigation of the matter and became conscientiously convinced that these items should be allowed, and so advocated in the committee-room. I mention this merely to show that the aspersions cast upon some gentlemen who have sought to reduce some of the items in this bill have not been justified when they are accused of parsimony.

I concur in the remarks made by the gentleman from New York last on the floor [Mr. DORSHEIMER]. I expressed yesterday my admiration for the utility of the West Point Academy. I know the gentleman did not allude to me in his remarks, but I made some remarks on the line which he has criticised. I believe that the standard of admission at the preliminary examination is too high to enable the poorer boys of the country, who have not the means for a thorough preparation, to obtain admission there.

I want to say further that while difficulty has been found to secure admissions from the Western districts, my own district as well as others, still my Congressional district has furnished some of the brightest stars among the military heroes and skilled officers of the war for the preservation of the Union. The present superintendent of the academy, General Merritt, was appointed from my Congressional district. I am satisfied there is not an officer of more integrity, of better judgment, and for his age and experience of greater ability in the Army to-day than General Merritt. Not one single word has fallen from my lips which can be tortured into a criticism of his management at West Point, for I think it has been excellent, and I entertain the highest respect for every recommendation he has made. I feel confident he would not urge any appropriation which he did not believe conscientiously was important for the benefit of the public service. He has proven himself to be one of the most gallant and valuable officers in the Army, and has highly distinguished himself in his administration of the affairs at West Point.

Another distinguished general, General Wilson, of cavalry fame, was appointed from the town in which I live. I could mention others who have been appointed from my district and from my State who have deserved the gratitude of the Republic. The criticism I made was, that the standard for the preliminary examination was too high for poor boys who have not opportunity to fit themselves for admission, and that the term of the course of study is too short. [Here the hammer fell.] I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read as follows:

For cadet laundry: One No. 4 washer, $360.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to amend the paragraph just read by inserting, after the word "washer," the words "connections and fixtures." That does not increase the appropriation; but simply makes it cover the connections and fixtures of the "No. 4 washer" provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to further amend by adding to the paragraph the words "to be immediately available." That is to enable them to make the purchases at once, and adds nothing to the appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill, as follows:

For cadet mess: One bake-oven in cadet mess, that is for brick, fire-brick, cement, mortar, grates, doors, and labor, the same to be built by skilled labor and to replace old oven long in use, $650.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to add to the paragraph just read the words "the same to be immediately available."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEIFER. I now move that the committee rise, report the bill back to the House with the amendments which have been made by the Committee of the Whole, recommend that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended passed.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLAND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with a recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended passed.

Mr. KEIFER. I call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. KEIFER. Unless a division is called for, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be voted on in gross.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe there is but one amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. There is but one substantial amendment; there are several verbal amendments.

There being no objection, the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, this being a general appropriation bill, the question upon its passage must be taken by yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 251, nays 4, not voting 65; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 462) to provide for the removal of obstructions to the free navigation of the navigable waters of the United States;

A bill (S. 1252) for the relief of Millie E. Hays, widow of John Hays, deceased;

A bill (S. 1563) providing for the punishment of persons falsely personating officers and employés of the United States; and Joint resolution (S. R. 64) providing for the addition of $10,000 to the contingent fund of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Several messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed a bill (H. R. 2555) to change the name of the National La Fayette and Bank of Commerce to that of the National La Fayette Bank.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. EATON. I presume that, to-morrow being Washington's Birthday, the House will not be in session, and as members desire Saturday to bring up their business at the Departments, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. That is a privileged motion.

Mr. BEACH and Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being—ayes 42, noes 112; more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 102, nays 153, not voting 65; as follows:

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next.

Mr. BUCKNER. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were ayes 20.

Mr. BUCKNER. Count the other side.

The other side was counted; and there were noes 134.

The SPEAKER. One-fifth of those present have not voted in favor of the yeas and nays, and they are therefore not ordered.

Mr. BUCKNER. I call for a division of the House on the motion to adjourn over.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 118, noes 49.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. MONEY, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads a bill (H. R. 5262) to establish post-roads; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill be put on its immediate passage. I will state there is no general legislation provided for in the bill, and that it covers only the establishment of post-roads. If it be not passed at this time it will be too late for the March advertisements and the July lettings.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill will be taken up for present consideration. The gentleman from Mississippi, chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, states it is confined exclusively to the establishment of post-roads.

Mr. MONEY. And there is no use of taking up the time of the House in having a long list of post-roads read, and I move that it be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MONEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC HIGHWAYS AS POST-ROADS.

Mr. MONEY. I move by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 1482) making the public roads and highways post-roads, returned from the Senate with amendments.

There was no objection, and the motion was agreed to.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

In line 1, after "highways," insert "while."

Strike out all after "post-roads," in line 2, down to and including line 5; so the bill will read:

"All public roads and highways, while kept up and maintained as such, are hereby declared to be post-roads."

Mr. PARKER. I desire to make an inquiry. Does this bill cover and include all railroads and railroad bridges?

Mr. MONEY. They are already post-roads now. All railroads are post-roads, and so are all plank-roads and navigable waters.

Mr. PARKER. And railroad bridges?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly. I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MONEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. CASSIDY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on the Pacific Railroads.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution and the accompanying report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the House when the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and of each part thereof, was definitely and finally located, and the plat or plats of such definite and final location filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, so far as said railroad has been definitely located, giving the date of the filing of each plat in said office, if more than one plat has been filed, and the length of line designated in each plat. And that he also inform the House whether the Northern Pacific Railroad Company has claimed or is claiming any lands on which homestead or pre-emption entries had been made within the limits of the grant to said company opposite to any part of the line of said railroad prior to the time of final definite location of such part of said line; and, if so, whether such claims of said company are being considered by his Department.

Mr. CALKINS. That is the resolution which was referred to the committee, I presume. Is there a report accompanying it?

Mr. CASSIDY. There is a report.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Pacific Railroads, having duly considered the accompanying resolution of inquiry, beg leave to report the same favorably and recommend its passage.

GEORGE W. CASSIDY,
Chairman of the Committee.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Nevada a question; whether his committee has been in session to consider the subject and whether this is a report from the committee?

Mr. CASSIDY. I am authorized by the committee to make the report.

Mr. CALKINS. Has the report been submitted to the committee?

Mr. CASSIDY. It has been.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask the question for this reason, that I do not believe the House ought to sanction a report of this kind coming from one of its committees because of the fact that it does not give the information to the House upon which the committee acted. In this particular case I have no objection to the report; but as a matter of practice, the whole theory of the rule adopted by the House is that the House should be placed by the committee in its report in possession of the information and the facts upon which the committee reached the conclusion recommended in their report.

This I regard as important, so that the House may be informed when it comes to act upon the question; otherwise we are all in the dark.

Now I shall make no further objection to the present resolution, because I do not care in this case; but I notify the House that hereafter I will make objection on the ground that the committees in their reports should give us the facts upon which they are based, so that we may be properly informed.

Mr. STRAIT. I would like to ask the gentleman from Nevada a question, and that is, if he has examined the report recently sent to the Senate on this same subject? This report was made by the Secretary of the Interior to the Senate, and I think it will be found on examination to contain all of the information that is covered by the present resolution.

Mr. CASSIDY. This is a resolution, I will state to the gentleman from Minnesota in response to his inquiry, which was introduced by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] some days ago, and the committee, having considered the subject carefully, instructed me to report it back to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HORR. What is it for?

Mr. CASSIDY. It is a request that the Secretary of the Interior inform the House about the location of the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and whether any lands are claimed by that railroad on which homestead or pre-emption entries had been made within the limits of the grant prior to the time of the final definite location of such road. It is a mere resolution of inquiry, as the gentleman will perceive.

Mr. STRAIT. I think the information asked for in this resolution is already fully embodied in a report made to the Senate by the Secretary of the Interior very recently in response to an inquiry upon the same subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from Minnesota states that as a matter of fact, of his own knowledge, of course this resolution is unimportant.

Mr. STRAIT. It is my impression that it contains all this information.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have looked very carefully over all of the reports, and I have been unable to find the information called for in this resolution. I do not think it has been furnished.

Mr. STRAIT. There is a very full report furnished by the Secretary upon this subject. Has the gentleman examined that?

Mr. HOLMAN. The definite fact covered by this resolution, and which it is sought to have the House ask this officer to furnish, is as to the time of the final location of the various parts of the road in question, and also whether any entries under the homestead or pre-emption laws have been made within what is now claimed as the limit of the road prior to the time of the final location. If my friend has been able to find any public document which furnishes such information he is certainly more fortunate than I have been.

Mr. CASSIDY. The committee have not been able to find it in their examination of the subject.

Mr. STRAIT. Have you examined the Senate report upon this question?

Mr. CASSIDY. Yes, sir.

Mr. STRAIT. If it is not in that report, of course I am mistaken. My impression has been, without examining closely into the subject, that it was embodied in the Senate report.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. SCALES. I hope it will be again reported to the House.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be again read.

The resolution was again reported.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CASSIDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUILDING FOR LIBRARY.

Mr. SINGLETON. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on the Library.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the bill which the gentleman desires to report, after which objections, if any, will be in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1139) authorizing the construction of a building for accommodation of the Congressional Library.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that had better come in in the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

LEWIS WESTON.

Mr. BRUMM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 5263) to reimburse Lewis Weston for injuries received while participating in the inaugural ceremonies of James A. Garfield, President of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call for the regular order.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I desire to make a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. A privileged report from a committee is in order even after the call for the regular order.

SUPERVISING ARCHITECT OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report back, with the recommendation that it be adopted, the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to this House the report of the committee appointed by the Treasury Department to investigate charges made against the management of the office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury under James G. Hill, together with the charges and evidence and all correspondence leading to said investigation, with all paper writings relating thereto.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to have the report read?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Yes, sir; I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit to this House the report of the committee appointed by the Treasury Department to investigate charges made against the management of the office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury under James G. Hill, together with all papers connected therewith, have had the same under consideration, and report it back with a unanimous recommendation that it pass.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CALKINS. From what committee is it reported?

The SPEAKER. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CALKINS. Will the chairman of the committee inform the House whether or not this entails any special work on the Department in furnishing to the House this information?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I think not. I am informed the Senate has received the same information. I desire to have it here before the House.

Mr. CALKINS. I recognize the fact that it may be perfectly proper to have this information furnished in the present case. But I want to make this statement: I was incidentally informed some time ago that resolutions of inquiry were sent to committees and reported back, some of which would take the Department six months with the entire force they had at their command to give the information called for. The House, I think, should always be informed as to the amount of work which such resolutions of inquiry entail.

Mr. RANDALL. What was the subject in the case alluded to by the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. CALKINS. It was something connected with the State Department.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman be a little more definite?

Mr. CALKINS. The resolution had reference to certain reports which had been made for a large number of years, I think forty or fifty years back, from foreign consuls, if I remember rightly.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. That has nothing to do with this resolution.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I think the gentleman from Indiana is entirely mistaken.

Mr. CALKINS. That was my information. And that is the reason why I am calling for reports to accompany these resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] demands the regular order.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution for reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain a request for unanimous consent when the regular order is called for.

Mr. SCALES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

GREELY RELIEF EXPEDITION.

The SPEAKER. Before putting the question on the motion to adjourn the Chair desires to lay before the House a message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State, of the 21st instant, whereby your honorable body, and through you the people of the United States, may become apprised of the generous contribution made by Her Britannic Majesty's Government toward the efforts for the relief of Lieutenant Greely's Arctic exploring party by presenting to the United States the Arctic steamship Alert.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 21, 1884.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the accompanying report of the Secretary of State be read, relating as it does to so generous a proposition made by a friendly power.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the communication from the Secretary of State covered by the message of the President.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask if the regular order is not the consideration of the bill for pensioning soldiers of the Mexican war?

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is the regular order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. And that comes from the other side of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. But the bill for pensioning soldiers of the Mexican war does not lose any of its right of precedence.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the communication from the Secretary of State.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 21, 1884.

To the PRESIDENT:

In the search for vessels suitable for the expedition now preparing to relieve Lieutenant Greely and his party, attention was early directed to the Alert, which is the property of the British Government, and was the advance ship of the expedition under Sir George Nares. It was desirable to secure this vessel, as she is peculiarly fitted for the intended service, and, as the inspecting officers recommended her, Mr. Lowell was therefore instructed to ask whether she could be spared for the service.

Information of the wish of this Government having previously and informally reached the British admiralty, a private intimation was conveyed to the United States minister to the effect that the British Government had not forgotten the very considerate conduct of this Government on the occasion of the recovery of the Resolute, and that should any suggestion be made that the vessel would be of use to the expedition she would be presented. The Resolute, a vessel, as the President remembers, formerly belonging to Her Majesty's navy, having been abandoned in the Arctic region, was discovered and brought to the United States by American seamen, and thereupon was purchased by this Government of her sailors, repaired, and returned to Great Britain. On her arrival in England the vessel was received by the Queen in person, and the officers of the United States Navy who took the ship thither were treated with every official and personal courtesy.

The Government of Her Majesty has now given the Alert to the United States unconditionally, with her anchors, chains, and such of her equipment as can be utilized.

Recognizing this graceful and opportune act of courtesy on the part of Her Majesty's Government, the undersigned to-day instructed Mr. Lowell as follows, by telegraph:

"Her Majesty's Government having presented to the Government of the United States the ship Alert to aid in the relief of Lieutenant Greely and his party, you will inform the secretary of state for foreign affairs that the spirit which prompts this act of generosity, and this evidence of sympathy with the object in view, receives the highest appreciation of the President, as it will that of the people of the United States. The President sends his cordial thanks for the opportune gift of this vessel, which he accepts in the name of the United States, and which will be used in the humane enterprise for which it is so peculiarly adapted."

Respectfully submitted.

FRED'K T. FRELINGHUYSEN.

[The reading of the message and the accompanying communication from the Secretary of State was interrupted and followed by much applause.]

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent that the message of the President, with the accompanying communication, be spread upon the Journal of the House as a mark of appreciation and as an expression of the sentiment of the House. I further ask that the message and communication be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with the object of having some more formal and proper recognition of this generous act of the British Government. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FINERTY. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I move that the message and the accompanying communication be spread upon the Journal of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I also move that the message and communication be printed in the usual form and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Can not we have a ship of our own without begging?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not answer that question.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL was agreed to; and the message, with the accompanying communication, was accordingly referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATORY AT FORT MYER, VIRGINIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a letter from the Secretary of War, dated the 19th instant, submitting a letter from the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, dated the 2d instant, and its accompanying plan of a proposed meteorological observatory at Fort Myer, Virginia, together with an estimate of the cost of the same in the sum of $4,000, and a statement giving various reasons why the said observatory should be established.

Mr. NEECE, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands:

Whereas George D. Bowman, register of the land office at Las Cruces, N. Mex., has advertised to sell on the 27th day of February five special sections of land, situated in townships 8 and 19 south of ranges 7 and 8 west, known as the Hot Springs reservation, to be sold in one body, and no bid to be received less than $15,000; and

Whereas it is represented that said lands contain the principal watering-places for probably half a million of acres of land, and that the persons controlling the said five sections will substantially control all the water in that part of the country, thereby rendering the remainder of the lands in that section worthless; it is represented that a portion of said lands are occupied by actual settlers, who have made valuable improvements upon the same, and said lands being sold in a body deprives these settlers of competing at such sale; and

Whereas it is believed by persons who have good opportunities of judging that said lands ought not to be sold but reserved for a health resort, and that said waters are known to contain medicinal properties: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, That the President of the United States be requested to stop and discontinue said sale, because if sold the result will be that said land will fall into the hands of large capitalists and thereby greatly hinder the settlement of the Territory, besides do injustice to actual settlers.

CLIFFORD ARRICK.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, presented the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Clifford Arrick, out of the contingent fund of the House, the sum of $52.64, for service rendered as a messenger in the post-office of the House of Representatives from the 17th day of November, 1883, to the 3d day of December, 1883, inclusive, at the rate of $1,200 per annum.

MURDER OF AMERICAN CITIZENS.

Mr. YOUNG. I ask by unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution for action at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it has been communicated to this House that Hon. Henry F. Cooper, of Tennessee, and Michael O'Brien and George H. Stiff, all citizens of the United States, were recently murdered in the interior of the Republic of Mexico while traveling through that country under the passport of their own Government: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of State be authorized and directed to make proper inquiry in respect to the murder of said persons, and ascertain whether or not it is proper to ask any redress therefor at the hands of the Mexican Government, and to lay before Congress such information as he may be able to obtain in relation to the matter.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I object to that resolution unless it is referred.

Mr. YOUNG. I can see no reason to prevent action on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the resolution is not before the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The only regular order, unless a motion be made, is the report of the Committee on Elections in the contested-election case from the State of Virginia.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I desire to submit a motion.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I desire to submit a privileged report.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I do not yield for that. I have waited a reasonable time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] has the floor.

DISEASES AMONG DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the unfinished business, the bill reported from the Committee on Agriculture. And pending that motion I move that all general debate in Committee of the Whole on the bill under consideration be limited to three hours and twenty-five minutes. I will state for the information of the House that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] is entitled to the floor, and has about twenty or twenty-five minutes of his time remaining. One hour, it is proposed, shall then be given to the friends of the bill and one hour to the opponents of the bill, and the hour that the committee is entitled to will be taken to close the discussion in favor of the bill.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri this question: If the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture designs by that motion to preclude me from the part in the debate which has been assigned to me and for which I have been recognized by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I have already stated that I propose to give the gentleman from Iowa the time he asked for and which he stated he would take.

The SPEAKER. The question is first on the motion that all general debate on the pending bill in Committee of the Whole be limited to three hours and twenty-five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. CONVERSE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and resumes consideration of the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals. By order of the House all general debate on the bill is limited to three hours and twenty-five minutes.

Mr. GIBSON. When the House was last in Committee of the Whole, engaged in the consideration of this bill, I had the honor to submit some criticism upon its provisions. In doing so I declared that this bill upon its face was a fraud. For fear that that expression may not have been understood by the House and that it might be inferred that I meant some reflection upon the Committee on Agriculture, I desire to say that there is no man in the House who has a higher regard for the members composing that committee than myself. I simply meant then and I mean now and I mean to show as far as I can, that the bill is delusive, and calculated by its title as well as by the arguments in favor of it to deceive those who desire to help the agricultural interest.

I wish to say before entering upon the further consideration of the bill that there is no man in this House who is more in favor of every bill that can possibly be passed here to help the agricultural interest than myself. I recognize the fact that the agricultural interest of this country has been made the great beast of burden and compelled to carry the load for the other industries of the land.

I recognize the further fact that much of this objection that is said to exist to our cattle and our stock in the foreign markets arises not from any defect in the cattle themselves, but from measures intended to be retaliatory to our legislation; that they are simply declarations on the part of foreign governments that when we adopt prohibitory legislation against their manufactures, we who can suffer through our agricultural interests shall be made to suffer thereby.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the objection to this bill is not that it provides for the extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia, because no man in this House would object to any bill for that purpose; but the objection to it is that it takes out of the hands of the owners of all the cattle in all this land the management and control of their own stock and puts it in the hands of Federal officials, and subjects them to prosecutions and fines and imprisonment at the hands of Federal courts. I had made the objection to this bill that it provided for an unlimited number of appointments by the Commissioner of Agriculture. I understand that the framers of the bill propose to avoid that objection by limiting the number to be employed to twenty. Whether that number be too large or too little I will not stop now to discuss, but leave that to others.

Another section that I had adverted to was the second section. The first section provides for a veterinary surgeon, and gives him power to do everything or to recommend everything necessary for the extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia. Then the second section provides for the appointment of two other officers who shall have the same powers as those conferred upon the veterinary surgeon, with the further power of providing the mode and manner, the where and the how, whereby all the cattle in this land should be carried to market. And then, further, after that proviso it is provided in another section of this bill that unless all these cattle are shipped as this Commissioner recommends, their owners shall be fined and imprisoned, at the discretion of the court, in a limited sum and for a limited time. I had then reached the further section which provided for declaring a State in quarantine, and I was objecting to that because it put into the hands of one department of this Government a power that belongs to no other branch of the Government—that of declaring a commercial war against one of the States without any investigation or trial by any competent authority in this land. The bill provides that upon notification from the Commissioner of Agriculture, based upon the report of his veterinary surgeon, he shall demand of a State that they shall put the treasury of that State and the cattle of that State in the power of this Commissioner; otherwise that it shall be quarantined and no cattle be allowed to enter or go out of it.

I say there is no other branch of the Government to which is given such power as it is proposed here to give to the Commissioner of Agriculture. Who is to investigate and determine the question whether such disease exists or not? Does this bill provide any mode in which that question can be determined? The State authorities may declare that no such disease exists and the Commissioner of Agriculture may declare that it does. Who, then, I ask, is to decide between them?

The question is then referred to the President. The President has his own officials, who constitute a part of his administration, who are given to him by law. Is it to be presumed that any President, when he has on the one side the action and statements of his officials, a part of his quasi Cabinet, and on the other side the declarations of the State officers, will decide with the State and against his own quasi Cabinet officer? It may be said that the Commissioner may provide some means by which this question can be settled and this difficulty obviated. I ask if this House is willing to commit to the hands of any officer the power to arbitrarily decide such a matter as this?

But, further than that, if a State is coerced into recognizing this commission, if a State is coerced into yielding to this law under the threat of quarantine, then there is another provision in this bill which is as yet unknown to any Department of this Government. I refer to the provision which authorizes the Commissioner to provide the mode and manner by which stock may be shot down and killed, to be paid for at a price to be settled by him, and by him alone; and the treasury of every State that yields to this law is to be locked or unlocked according to the finding of this Commissioner of the value which he puts upon the cattle so destroyed. It is not necessary to say that this official will not be honest or to say that he will be honest. I say that no good government will put such power as that over the property of its citizens into the hands of any one.

Under no other law, under no provision of the Constitution, can you take the property of any man away from him except upon just compensation, to be ascertained in accordance with due provisions of law. But here you step in and undertake to create a commission that will shoot down people's cattle, fix a price upon them, and not only fix that price, but declare that the State shall pay one-half of it and the Federal Government pay the other half. Where else under our organic law is there any such power given to any Department or officer of the Government? And why should it be given to the Commissioner of Agriculture, an officer not recognized by our Constitution?

Not only that. That is but a part of the defects of this bill. Another serious defect is that it proposes to enlarge the already threatening jurisdiction of the Federal courts, and to put all the cattle interests of this land into the hands of the Federal courts and of Federal officials. I believe it was Thomas Jefferson who warned this country against the encroaching power of the Federal courts. Following up Thomas Jefferson, Senator Carpenter in one of his speeches in the Senate declared that the Federal courts in this land had become a menace to the country, and that trials now in the courts were but trials by marshals and petty officials, and not trials by jury.

Here is a bill introduced into Congress to take the management of this important cattle interest out of the hands of the owners, and submit it to the control of Federal officials under arbitrary rules to be established by them. And then if those rules are violated, the men who violate them are to be fined and imprisoned by Federal courts. What necessity is there for this vast increase of the jurisdiction of the Federal courts? Why should the cattle interest of this land be turned over to them?

I do not mean to assail the Federal judiciary further than to say that abuses, whether they can help them or not, have crept into their proceedings until they have been felt by this land as the breath of a pestilence. In the capital of my own State I have seen men, women, and children dragged there by Federal officials, and camped in the streets like refugees fleeing from a great army. I have seen homesteads broken up and people imprisoned. Nothing saved them from absolute destruction except the intelligent interference of the district attorney in many cases, as my colleague here [Mr. GOFF] will bear me out, coming forward out of kindness to investigate these matters; nothing but the interference, the extra-judicial interference, of the judge and the district attorney saved many of them from absolute destruction.

I am opposed to extending the power of the Federal courts. I am opposed to turning over this great interest into the hands of these Federal officials. I believe that the great cattle interest of this country can take care of itself.

If the friends of this bill will eliminate some of its monstrous propositions, if they will bring in here a bill, the effect of which will be to extirpate pleuro-pneumonia or any other infectious disease, then I will do all I can to pass it. But I will never consent to pass any bill having in it the provisions which this bill has.

Let me call the attention of the friends of this bill for a moment to some of those provisions. There is one section of the bill which declares that no railroad shall transport any cattle to any market from any infected section of the country or from any part where these diseases exist. Suppose our friends up in Dakota having a large number of cattle want to get them to the Chicago market or that our friends in Colorado want to get their cattle to the Saint Louis market. They would be sharp enough to lay charges before the Commissioner of Agriculture that in the State of Texas or in any other State or Territory there are infected cattle. Then these cattle must stop there until the Commissioner can investigate; and while the Commissioner is investigating gentlemen who have made the charges for their own purposes can hurry on their cattle to market. Thus hundreds of cattle-men may be made bankrupt by having to hold their cattle back in this way.

Take another case. Here are two farmers side by side, each of whom has a drove of cattle. Both of them want to ship their cattle to the same market. One steps in and makes charges against the cattle of the other, whose cattle must then be kept there until the matter can be investigated, while the man who makes the charges can hurry on his cattle to market.

This bill in its practical operation will work destruction and bankruptcy upon the cattle interest. There is no such prevalence of cattle disease in this country as will justify the passage of such a monstrous bill. Why, sir, the very condition of our country, the health of the people, the growth of the great cattle interest, the making of vast fortunes out of this business, give the lie to the charge that this disease is spreading over the country and is so serious as to call for a measure of this kind. No such legislation is needed; and I tell my friend from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] that the adoption of this bill would be such a calamity as not even his constituents would indorse.

Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to consume further time upon this bill. Having expressed my objections to it, I propose to yield what time I have remaining to my friend from Texas [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] for giving me a portion of his time; but I should not feel at liberty to avail myself of his kindness and to venture to say anything in regard to the pending bill were it not that if it becomes a law it will seriously affect one of the principal industries of my State, and for the further reason that I entertain views in regard to this bill which so far as I know have not been expressed by any gentleman who has spoken adversely to it.

As was stated the other day by my colleague [Mr. LANHAM], if there were nothing more involved in the bill now under consideration than the extirpation of the disease called pleuro-pneumonia Texas would have no special reason for opposing it, for that disease is unknown in our State, and there is but little if any probability that it will ever prevail in our section. But the bill goes much further, and embraces within its provisions all diseases of cattle that may be termed contagious, and for the reason that diseases of this character may be wrongfully imputed to cattle it does affect an interest in my State that in value amounts to many millions of dollars. But if the bill were so framed as to limit its operation to the extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia I could not give to it my support because of the unlimited power it places in the hands of one man.

The bill comes to us with a unanimous report from the Committee on Agriculture, who indorse all its provisions and recommend its passage.

Mr. AIKEN. Will the gentleman from Texas allow me to make a single remark?

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. AIKEN. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman, but it has been asserted by two speakers that this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Agriculture. As I was in opposition to the bill in the committee and did not vote for it there, reserving the right to vote against it in the House if compelled to pronounce a yea-and-nay vote, it is due to myself to say that this was not a unanimous report from the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. In reply to my friend from South Carolina I can only say that I got the idea from the report made by the chairman of the committee, who states that it is a unanimous report. Such a report with me would have great weight, and if I were at all doubtful about the correctness of my opinion I should be willing to surrender my views to those expressed by the committee, and particularly so in this instance, because Texas has a voice in that committee, my colleague [Mr. OCHILTREE] being a member of it. It may be that he, like the gentleman from South Carolina, did not concur in the report. I do not know whether he did or not, for I have not consulted him, but I trust that if he does entertain the views expressed in the report of his committee he will inform us what induced him to reach that conclusion.

When the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture presented the bill to the consideration of this committee he seemed to appreciate the necessity of saying something in behalf of the authority of Congress to pass a bill so extraordinary in its character. I was glad that he did so, for I am one who yet believes that we have a constitution the powers and limitations of which should be duly respected.

Before I had the pleasure of hearing the honorable gentleman I had supposed that he would rest his argument upon that broad provision of the organic law that concedes to Congress the power to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, a provision that has often been misconstrued and made the prolific source of much of the evil legislation with which this country has been afflicted. But he did not take shelter under that provision of the Constitution, but chose to rely upon one of the clear, specific, and well-defined powers conferred by the Constitution upon Congress—the power to regulate commerce among the several States. Apparently this bill has no connection with the power given to Congress to regulate commerce among the several States; but, inasmuch as it does undertake to regulate and govern the transportation of cattle on railways passing through two or more States, I will for the purpose of this argument concede that it does properly come under that section of the Constitution.

Now, let us stop for a moment and inquire why that power was conferred upon Congress. It is hardly necessary for me to do so, for the purpose is obvious. The framers of our organic law in conceding this authority to the Federal Government were providing a remedy for the evils that had been experienced under the Articles of Confederation, and wisely lodged this great power in Congress, where all the States have representation and where the possibly conflicting interests of different States could be equitably adjusted. They determined that no State nor any number of States less than all should have this great power. It was placed in the hands of the Federal Government so that no State nor any number of States less than the entire Union should have the power to discriminate against the commerce of any one or more of the States.

No State now attempts to regulate or interfere with the commerce of another State. A State has the power to enact laws regulating its own commerce, and in doing this may incidentally affect the commerce of another State, but the power to regulate commerce among the several States, it is conceded, belongs to the Federal Government. Mr. Chairman, it is not only a very great power, but it is a high trust, confided by the organic law to the legislative department of the Federal Government for wise, just, and beneficent purposes, and in my judgment it is such a trust that Congress can not by substitution lodge it elsewhere.

I now ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] a question which I desire him to answer in his closing argument, and it is this: If the fathers of this Republic were unwilling to intrust a State, or any number of States less than all composing this Union, with the power to regulate commerce among the several States, can it for a moment be thought that Congress has the right to clothe an individual with this great authority? If Congress can not invest a State of this Union with this power, can it be placed in the hands of an individual, an individual restrained by no provision of law by which his discretion may be regulated, governed, or controlled? Let me illustrate. Suppose the Committee on Commerce should report a bill to the House conferring unlimited authority upon the Secretary of the Treasury to make such rules and regulations as he might deem proper, governing passenger fares and rates of freight on railways passing through two or more States, what would be thought of such a bill?

Ridiculous as would be such a bill, it would not be more absurd than are the provisions of the bill now under consideration. We have been told, Mr. Chairman, that a very great amount of capital in this country is invested in live-stock and in the commerce thereof; that it amounts to very many millions; but notwithstanding the magnitude of this interest, it is placed by the terms of this bill subject to the control of one man, who, by an error of judgment, may inflict irreparable injury upon many who are interested in the animal industries of this country. Under the third section of this bill the Commissioner of Agriculture is invested with full power to make such rules and regulations as he in his wisdom may see proper to make for the extirpation of such contagious diseases as he may think exist in the cattle or live-stock of any State or States, and it also clothes him with authority to interfere and control the transportation of such stock as he may think is diseased from one State to another. In justification of these extraordinary powers conferred by this bill upon the Commissioner of Agriculture it may be said that in the very nature of things quarantine measures must be left largely to the discretion of the officer intrusted with the enforcement of the law. I grant that it is so. I further admit that in many instances mere ministerial duties to be performed by officers may be left somewhat to their discretion, but that discretion is always limited and regulated by some statutory enactment. But this bill not only invests the Commissioner with the authority to enforce the law, but it also invests him with the authority to make the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDEMAN].

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Under the arrangement the friends of the bill have the next hour, but if the gentleman from Texas desires to conclude his speech now I for one shall have no objection. I hope my friend from Iowa will give way for that purpose.

Mr. WELLER. I raise this objection, Mr. Chairman, that an arrangement has been entered into which it seems to me ought to be kept in honor.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. It will not interfere with the time of the gentleman from Iowa if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDEMAN] now takes the floor and yields to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEWART] to conclude his speech.

Mr. WELLER. I have no objection to that arrangement, if I shall be recognized next.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. The gentleman will be recognized for the next hour.

Mr. HARDEMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Texas want?

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Ten minutes.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I will yield for that time to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I am obliged to the gentleman, and as I was remarking when the hammer fell, this bill confers on the Commissioner of Agriculture not only the power to enforce law, but it absolutely confers on him, without any restriction whatever, the power to make the law which he may enforce. He is invested with authority to legislate. Inasmuch as this Government by the Constitution is divided into three departments—the legislative, executive, and judicial—I believe that the legislative department can no more subdelegate its authority than can the functions of the executive or judiciary be discharged by others than those who are charged with the performance of their duties by the Constitution.

I take it, Mr. Chairman, that no one will deny that by the third section of this bill the Commissioner of Agriculture is invested with the exclusive authority of making such rules and regulations as he in his wisdom and discretion may deem proper for the extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases to which cattle and other animals may be subject.

He can do more, sir. He has the power under the terms of this bill to nullify the action of the constituted authorities of a State. The Legislature of a State, acting upon the recommendations of its executive, may in their combined wisdom make the best law they know how to devise for the extirpation of these contagious diseases, and they may enact a good and sufficient law for the purpose, yet if in the opinion of the Commissioner of Agriculture such law is insufficient for the purpose of extirpating the disease he can set aside the authority of the State, or at least he can declare such State to be in quarantine. Am I right in this assertion? Let me read the fourth section of the bill:

> That whenever a State or Territory in any section of which a contagious or infectious disease exists which the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation fails to make provisions for its extirpation or to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the extirpation of such disease, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare in quarantine the said State or Territory, or such part of said State or Territory as he may deem dangerous to the animal industries of the country, and to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district.

Now, I ask who determines whether a State has failed to make provision for the extirpation of said diseases? And I answer that by the very terms of the bill it must be the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Such extraordinary power, I undertake to say, was never before attempted to be conferred upon an individual by any legislation that has occurred in this country. It cannot be justified upon the plea of military necessity, and I very much doubt whether during any war in which this country has been involved a precedent can be found for such unwarranted legislation. Certainly no excuse can be made for it now.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Will the gentleman from Texas permit me ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I may have misunderstood the gentleman from Texas, but I wish to know whether I understand him to say the bill in any one of its provisions looks to conferring upon the Commissioner of Agriculture the power to declare any State in quarantine?

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. It gives to the President of the United States upon information communicated to him by the Commissioner of Agriculture such power, and I take it that if the President acts at all under the provisions of the bill, he can only do so because of the information he receives from the Commissioner of Agriculture, and therefore it is practically the act of said Commissioner that establishes quarantine.

To induce the States to co-operate with the Commissioner of Agriculture in the enforcement of his rules and regulations for the extirpation of these diseases, the bill provides that the General Government shall pay one-half of the expense of quarantine and of such other measures as may be adopted for the extinction of the said diseases. If this be, as has been contended by some friends of the measure, a matter of national interest and importance, why visit upon a State any portion of the expense?

But I submit another question. Under the authority conferred by this bill the President of the United States may not only declare a State to be in quarantine, but he may declare a part of a State to be in quarantine. What is meant by that provision? Is it intended to give the President the power to declare a part of a State to be in quarantine as to other States and there stop, or does it give him the power to declare a portion of a State to be in quarantine not only as to other States but also to other portions of the same State not infected with the disease? If he can do the latter, and the bill is certainly susceptible of that construction, and I believe it is susceptible of no other fair construction, then the bill goes far beyond the power conferred by the Constitution upon Congress to regulate commerce among the States. The power given is to regulate commerce among the several States, and not to regulate the commerce of a State. Mark the distinction. Under that provision of the Constitution no warrant is found for the invasion of a State by Federal authority and the destruction of its local self-government.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman will permit me, I purpose to offer an amendment confining that to the transportation of cattle across the lines of the States. I believe it will be acceptable and also remove the ambiguity.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I could not, of course, anticipate the amendment proposed to be made by the gentleman from Maine. I find the matter to which I have alluded in the printed bill and I was addressing myself to it.

The bill contains many other objectionable features, but I am unable in my limited time to discuss them all. I should be pleased if I had the time to present my views of that feature of the bill that gives to the Commissioner of Agriculture the authority to interfere with the transportation of cattle by railways or otherwise from one State to another. It is a most extraordinary and unwarranted power, but I have not the time to do more than to call the attention of this committee to it.

My time has almost expired, but I wish to say another word. The gentleman from Missouri alluded to the fact that Congress had passed laws in relation to quarantine measures that justify and form a precedent for this bill. It is true that the act of 1879 creating a national board of health does permit said board to interfere with the local regulations of States on that subject. In extenuation of those who made that law it may be said that it was legislation in behalf of human life and that it was not in relation to a question of dollars and cents. It was at a time when distress prevailed in many portions of this land, and when those sentiments of the human heart which well up in the bosom of every good man at the sight of human suffering impelled them in their anxiety to prevent the spread of disease and death to go beyond the limit of constitutional authority. It was a bad law, and now serves as a precedent for the enactment of another bad law, and the fact that it is used for this purpose should admonish us to stop these continued infractions of the Constitution, and especially should this be done by men of my political faith, who, knowing that we have a constitution, have due regard for its powers and limitations, and if we but continue to adhere to its provisions, bills like the one under consideration will not meet with favor, and no longer precedents will be established for placing unauthorized and unwarranted power in the hands of irresponsible persons who may exert it for the oppression of the people.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, during the discussion of this bill by the House a few days since I heard some gentleman remark, "this is a bill that appeals not only to the American pocket but to the American stomach." In my opinion this bill has far greater significance and is of far more importance than that. It is an appeal to the highest considerations of public welfare. It concerns the health and the lives indeed of millions of people who have the right to look to us for protection.

A bill of such importance should have, as it appears this is having, the most careful analysis and exhaustive research for authorities of the highest character concerning its every feature.

The necessity for immediate measures of some kind is made evident by the testimony of many of our most prominent and experienced farmers, stock-raisers, stock-dealers, and skillful veterinary surgeons; as well, the people and press of the country are demanding that heed be given to the dangers that threaten the health and lives of our people. Also, we should view with alarm the financial losses which we are sustaining and shall sustain in consequence of the diseases prevailing among our domestic animals.

This bill appeals to the American pocket and stomach indeed!

It is shown by reliable data that France alone, by refusing to admit American pork because of real or suspected diseases of American swine, closed her markets to the products of American farms to the value of $19,000,000 yearly. Germany has adopted practically the same measures—the exclusion of American pork from her markets.

Thus the doors to millions of stomachs not American are shut sharp against American products by reason of fears that may be dispelled by proper action on the part of the Congress of the United States, acting in harmony with the authorities proper of the several States, to suppress and extirpate diseases peculiar to the swine of our country, or, rather, to some sections of our country.

In the coming days of this session our ears will grow weary with hearing the specious demands for "protection to American manufacturing industries." Let the advocates of protection now prove their sincerity by supporting such measures as will avert the dangers that threaten the most valuable exports that American industry produces. American beef, as well as American pork, will soon be inhibited in foreign markets unless this bill or some similar and more wise measure shall be adopted.

The value in round numbers of our exports of neat cattle in the year 1882 was over forty-one millions of dollars ($41,769,537). This amount was made up of the following items:

Neat's-foot oil	$53,736
Fresh beef	6,768,881
Salt beef	3,902,556
Butter	2,864,570
Cheese	4,058,975
Condensed milk	200,049
Preserved meats	2,104,304
Tallow	4,915,798
Live cattle	7,800,227
Total	41,769,537

Certainly so important a source of commercial prosperity should not fail through our neglect.

But great as is the value of the exports of neat-cattle products, that of swine products is vastly greater. The total exports of swine products in 1882 in round numbers amounted to over seventy-eight millions of dollars ($78,699,856). This amount is made up of the following items:

Lard-oil	$434,124
Bacon	42,124,602
Hams	4,551,172
Preserved meats	2,104,304
Lard	28,975,902
Hogs	509,651
Total	78,699,856

Right here, in view of the amendments which I propose to offer at the proper time, I ask particular attention to the comparative income derived from the exports of cattle and swine products. The exports of cattle products amounted in round numbers to forty-one millions of dollars ($41,769,537). The exports of swine products amounted to nearly twice that sum, or $78,699,856.

In addition to the foregoing exhibits of the hog and cattle products exported in 1882, there were in the United States in 1880, as shown by the Tenth Census, of live-stock in numbers, respectively, as follows:

Horses	10,357,488
Mules	1,812,808
Oxen	993,841
Milch cows	12,443,720
Other cattle	22,488,550
Sheep	35,192,074
Swine	47,681,700
Total	130,969,581

Grouping and classifying, there were in the United States in 1880, as shown by the census—

Horses and mules	12,000,000
Sheep	35,000,000
Cattle	36,000,000
Swine	48,000,000
Total	131,000,000

Or, better yet for my present purposes, there were of—

Cattle	36,000,000
Horses and mules, sheep and swine	95,000,000

Now, it should need no further argument to prove the magnitude of the interests involved. When foreign markets are closed against our beef and our pork, because they are in fact or because they are suspected to be diseased, there ceases to flow a fountain of prosperity that yearly adds not less than one hundred and nineteen millions to the sum of our national wealth. The fortunes of thousands of farmers and stockmen are dependent upon the yearly crop of cattle, swine, and other stock. Many thousands of families throughout the land look to the income derived from the swine which they raise for the chief source of their prosperity, and ofttimes for the continued possession of the homes that shelter them. Their hog crop is their most profitable and ofttimes their only source of income. It is their only protection against the bane of debt and the curse of ruinous interest; against King Shylock with his iron-clad 10 per cent. mortgage and its inevitable attorney's fees; and, frequently also, stipulation for liquidated damages in case of non-payment at maturity.

Many are the farmers throughout the great Northwest whose farms have been lost and whose homes have been taken from them because hog-cholera had swept away that product of their toil that formed their principal reliance, if not their only source of income.

I know something about this matter myself as a practical farmer. I confess I have a special interest in this question, and I further confess that the constituency of the fourth Congressional district of Iowa, as well the State, yea, the great Northwest, the West, the Southwest, and South, have an especial interest in a wise solution of this question, as I expect to fully show further on.

Two years ago, in less than thirty days I lost from my herd of fattening swine several hundred dollars in value. Others within my personal knowledge lost thousands upon thousands of dollars of value in the same way.

The great Northwest has within the last few years lost millions of dollars in value from diseases peculiar to hogs, horses, and sheep. I know of scores of horses in the last two years being condemned by the authorities and shot or otherwise destroyed because pronounced to be diseased with that highly infectious disease termed glanders.

Reports, which I deem wholly reliable, inform me that Professor Stalker, of Ames Agricultural College, has recently ordered, after an examination, several horses shot, pronouncing them diseased with glanders.

In the matter of sheep industries, my nearest neighbor a few years ago lost some seven to eight hundred fine merino sheep, many of them thoroughbreds and of great value. They were attacked with scab and grub, and, although he expended hundreds of dollars in their treatment under the direction of the best skill obtainable, he was finally compelled in midwinter to slaughter the entire flock for the sake of saving even some of their pelts.

This is not an isolated case. Millions of dollars in value in like manner have been swept away. Not only in the State of Iowa and in the Northwest, but in other sections of the country, notably in Texas, as shown by the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1883, various diseases are making frightful ravages among the sheep.

We read a great deal about a protective tariff on wool; distinguished gentlemen on this floor will be very earnest for a protective tariff on wool. It will be well for them to bear in mind that unless some measures are taken to check the rapid spread of sheep disease there will soon be very little wool to protect.

My object in making the foregoing statements is to show the value of the animal industries severally and in detail, with the losses actual and probable, and thus have proper basis for the inquiry why the bill under consideration so frequently makes reference to the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia of forty years' location with but little change, while so little reference is had to the diseases affecting the other animal industries by which millions have been swept away?

In the last Congress the insignificant sum of $50,000 as an appropriation was sought. The bill failed.

This bill asks the comparatively insignificant sum of $250,000 to spread out over thirty-eight States and nine Territories besides the District of Columbia, unless it be the purpose of the bill to use the $250,000 for the "suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia" in the States bordering on the Atlantic as far south as the State of Virginia, leaving the great Northwest, the West, Southwest, and South to provide for themselves

I have the fullest confidence in our Commissioner of Agriculture, but in my humble opinion a bill should be so framed that it shall be the duty of said Commissioner of Agriculture, as the proper head of the proposed bureau of animal industry, to give the greatest attention and apply the greatest skill and energy of his department where there is the greatest danger.

I hope I shall not be understood as opposing measures that tend to the suppression of pleuro-pneumonia; indeed I am most earnestly in favor of all wise measures for its speedy "suppression and extirpation;" yet I am apprehensive that it may, on fuller investigation, be found that this disease is not only indigenous, but is confined to certain latitudes and sections of country bordering on the Atlantic Ocean.

I am of the opinion that no bill involving such issues as this bill does should be passed into a national law, providing as this does heavy penalties against each person, railroad corporation, or owner or master of any boat or vessel who shall "receive for transportation" "any live-stock affected with contagious or infectious disease," "especially the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia," until such bill provides amply for a system of governmental inspection, at the cost of the Government, at each shipping point within its jurisdiction where live-stock is received for transportation to points without such State or Territory.

If the shippers of this country are to be subject to prosecutions by the United States district attorneys in all cases of "violations of this act which shall be brought to their notice or knowledge by any person making the complaint," it would seem proper that some available system of inspection should be made for the protection of dealers and shippers—at least a government "hoss-doctor" should be provided at each shipping point, whose certificate should be an immunity against all prosecutions and persecutions.

It would require many millions of dollars to provide in each State and Territory for the suppression and extirpation of communicable diseases among other stock than cattle, such as are very destructive to the animal industries of State and nation, and I would advocate an appropriation of millions, if need be, from the Treasury for the purposes contemplated in this bill, rather than seek by surreptitious means to bore two hundred and fifty or more gimlets in the Treasury vaults of size sufficient to leak out $6 per day into the hands of such members of this House as were so unfortunate by birth, fate, or education as to not have had assigned to them the chairmanship of a committee whereby to secure a "clerical lamp" to "illuminate their judgment" for the work they were elected to do without the aid of such peculations.

By the report of the Committee on Agriculture, of which I am a member—and here I wish to say in parenthesis and deferentially, our chairman, an able lawyer, has given his most earnest attention to this bill and its general purposes have received his heartiest support, and he has made a most exhaustive research for authorities and facts in support of it and its several parts; and, being acknowledged as one of the ablest jurists, I doubt not he will in his final remarks be able to quiet some of the fears that appear to have arisen in the minds of others as well my own, that certain clauses of the bill impinge on the rights of the States to control their own domestic affairs, except such as are delegated to Congress by the United States Constitution.

Cooley, in his great work on Constitutional Limitations, holds this language:

When questions arise of conflict between national and State authority, and questions whether the State exceeds its just powers in dealing with the property and restraining the actions of individuals, it often becomes necessary to consider the extent and proper bounds of any power in the States, which, like that of taxation, pervades every department of business and reaches to every interest and every subject of profit or enjoyment. We refer to what is known as the police power.

The police power of a State, in a comprehensive sense, embraces its whole system of internal regulation, by which the State seeks not only to preserve the public order and to prevent offenses against the State, but also to establish for the intercourse of citizen with citizen those rules of good manners and good neighborhood which are calculated to prevent a conflict of rights, so far as is reasonably consistent with a like enjoyment of rights by others.

In the present chapter we shall take occasion to speak of the police power principally as it affects the use and enjoyment of property, the object being to show the universality of its presence and to indicate so far as may be practicable the limits which settled principles of constitutional law assigned to its interference.

No definition of the power can be more complete and satisfactory than some which have been given by eminent jurists in deciding cases which have arisen from its exercise, and which have been so often approved and adopted that to present them in any other than the language of the decisions would be unwise, if not inexcusable. Says Chief-Justice Shaw:

"We think it is a settled principle, * * * growing out of the nature of well-ordered civil society, that every holder of property, however absolute and unqualified may be his title, holds it under the implied liability that his use for it shall not be injurious to the equal enjoyment of others having an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor injurious to the rights of the community. All property in this Commonwealth is * * * held subject to those general regulations which are necessary to the common good and general welfare. Rights of property, like all other social and conventional rights, are subject to such reasonable limitations in their enjoyment as shall prevent them from being injurious, and to such reasonable restraints and regulations established by law as the Legislature, under the governing and controlling power vested in them by the constitution, may think necessary and expedient. This is very different from the right of eminent domain, the right of a government to take and appropriate private property whenever the public exigency requires it, which can be done only on condition of providing a reasonable compensation therefor. The power we allude to is rather the police power—the power vested in the Legislature by the constitution to make, ordain, and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable laws, statutes, and ordinances, either with penalties or without, not repugnant to the constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of the Commonwealth and of the subjects of the same. It is much easier to perceive and realize the existence and sources of this power than to mark its boundaries or prescribe limits of its exercise."

"This police power of the State," says another eminent judge, "extends to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons, and the protection of all property within the State. According to the maxim, sic utere two ut alienum non lædas, which being of universal application, it must, of course, be within the range of legislative action to define the mode and manner in which every one may so use his own as not to injure others." And again, [by this] "general police power of the State persons and property are subject to all kinds of restraints [for the] health and prosperity of the State; of the perfect right in the Legislature to do which no question ever was, or, upon acknowledged general principles, ever can be made, so far as natural persons are concerned."

Where the power is located.—In the American constitutional system the power to establish the ordinary regulations of police has been left with the individual States, and it can not be taken from them, either wholly or in part, and be exercised under legislation of Congress. Neither can the National Government, through any of its departments or officers, assume any supervision of the police regulations of the States. All that the Federal authority can do is to see that the States do not, under cover of this power, invade the sphere of national sovereignty, obstruct or impede the exercise of any authority which the Constitution has confided to the nation, or deprive any citizen of rights guaranteed by the Federal Constitution.

Again, in another place:

Perhaps the most striking illustration of the principle here stated will be found among the judicial decisions, which have held that the rights insured to private corporations by their charters and the manner of their exercise are subject to such new regulations as from time to time may be made by the State with a view to the public protection, health, and safety, and in order to guard properly the rights of other individuals and corporations. Although these charters are to be regarded as contracts, and the rights assured by them are inviolable, it does not follow that these rights are at once, by force of the charter-contract, removed from the sphere of the State regulation; and that the charter implies an undertaking on the part of the State, that in the same way in which their exercise is permissible at first, and under the regulations then existing, and those only, may the corporations continue to exercise their rights while the artificial existence continues. The obligation of the contract by no means extends so far; but, on the contrary, the rights and privileges which came into existence under it are placed upon the same footing with other legal rights and privileges of the citizen, and subject in like manner to proper rules for their due regulation, protection, and enjoyment.

And also, in connection with this subject, we find:

The line of distinction between that which constitutes an interference with commerce and that which is a mere police regulation is sometimes exceedingly dim and shadowy, and it is not to be wondered at that learned jurists differ when endeavoring to classify the cases which arise. It is not doubted that Congress has the power to go beyond the general regulations of commerce which it is accustomed to establish, and descend to the most minute directions, if it shall be deemed advisable; and that to whatever extent grounds shall be covered by those directions, the exercise of State power is excluded. Congress may establish police regulations as well as the States, confining their operations to the subjects over which it is given control by the Constitution. But as the general police power can be better exercised under the supervision of the local authority, and mischiefs are not likely to spring therefrom so long as the power to arrest collision resides in the courts, the regulations which are made by Congress do not often exclude the establishment of others by the State governing very many particulars. Moreover, the regulations of commerce are usually, and in some cases must be, general and uniform for the whole country, while in some localities State and local policy will demand peculiar regulations with reference to special and peculiar circumstances.

Many gentlemen on this floor, among the ablest and most distinguished for their knowledge of constitutional law, as also the highest judicial interpretation thereof, have expressed the opinion that section 4 of this bill is in most serious contravention of the rights of the States to control their own domestic concerns, such as would be affected by the terms of this bill. The interests at stake should not permit us to pass hastily, by or upon such objections. Such issues have been presented most seriously to the attention of our people heretofore, and which have been settled by the arbitrament of war at a cost of hundreds of thousands of lives and thousands of millions of treasure.

There can be no question but that the General Government, by its Congress, can appropriate to each State any sum of money it may deem proper, to be used for such or similar purposes, prescribing the conditions on which any State may accept and use the same. I am of the further opinion that the President of these United States has constitutional authority, when properly informed, to prohibit the transportation of stock infected with communicable diseases dangerous to the general welfare from the State in which they do exist into States or Territories where they do not exist.

I desire here to make a brief analysis of the report of our committee in the premises of the bill under consideration:

Said report shows, on pages 5 and 6, that in Connecticut two herds of cattle were affected with pleuro-pneumonia; twelve animals were exposed, seven contracted the disease, four died, one was killed, and the other two, for aught we know, are still alive.

Said report further shows, as to New York, as follows: "Although the disease is almost entirely confined to the western end of Long Island, to Staten Island, and New York city, these localities are extensively infected;" but no numbers of animals are given as being thus infected, not one is mentioned as being affected.

Said report further shows that "New Jersey was recently supposed to be nearly free from pleuro-pneumonia," but "reliable authority places the loss at over fifty head."

PENNSYLVANIA.

According to an official report, dated October 30, the number of animals known to have been exposed was one hundred and four, and the number of sick ones that had been killed or had died was forty-six.

It is now believed that the disease has been entirely overcome, and that the State of Pennsylvania is free from it.

MARYLAND AND DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

From our committee's said report it appears that the ravages of this disease are greatest in Maryland and the District of Columbia, and that such ravages appear to be confined to the cities of Baltimore and Washington, two places not remarkably celebrated as cattle-producing districts.

An official examination of the cattle in Iowa shows that the reports of pleuro-pneumonia among the herds of the State are utterly groundless.—Nashua Post.

But I see no reason why preference should be given to these few cases in these few States over sections of the country that have suffered, that are suffering, and are likely to suffer infinitely more from other diseases to other kinds of animals.

The loss of one hundred and four head of cattle in three Atlantic States, even granting that such disease is liable to extend to the cattle-raising districts of the Northwest, West, Southwest, and South, does not conclude my mind that all the money this Government has to expend for the suppression or extirpation of diseases among domestic animals should be expended especially upon the disease known as "pleuro-pneumonia," while foreign markets are closed to American pork because it is diseased in fact or because disease may be reasonably suspected, and thus $79,000,000 of wealth kept out of the pockets of American producers. Thus my views are in reality confirmed by the report of the committee.

The report, on page 7, states:

Now, while it is true that pleuro-pneumonia has existed in the last forty years without having been carried West, * * * it must be admitted that there has been danger of this.

I add, this may be true as to the danger of transmission of this disease to herds in the West by contact with stock infected or affected, yet I doubt it. But what of the bill under consideration for the relief of the stock-raisers, stock-shippers, and stock-dealers in the great Northwest, West, Southwest, and South, as compared with the relief evidently intended by the terms of this bill to be granted to the cattle industries of some of the New England States and a few others bordering on the Atlantic? Why give our whole attention to some anticipated danger while a greater danger actually exists? So, while I am in hearty accord with the general purposes of this bill, it should in my opinion be amended in several particulars very materially.

It is objected that this bill lodges great powers of privilege and duty in the hands of the present Commissioner of Agriculture. I answer, he has been tried and not found wanting in requisite qualifications for similar trusts, and there is no doubt in my mind, should this or some similar bill become a law, that he will wisely execute as provided therein. It is only needful that Congress be exceedingly careful to frame a bill which, passed into law, will, being executed, give the desired relief.

The general purposes of this bill, in view of the magnitude of interests involved, should preclude even the semblance of partisan politics to enter into the domain of its consideration. I was deeply pained the other day in listening to a seemingly predetermined effort to make political capital at the expense of this measure. Why not rise above patriotism to party? Why not now, in this case, rise to that altitude of true and noble statesmanship that makes the harm to many, as shown by the facts cited, the great concern of all? Shall mere party expediency be permitted to affect a wise consideration and determination of questions of such grave import to the whole human family, as it were, as the questions of profit and loss; but, graver yet, the question of food of diseased beef, diseased pork, diseased cheese, diseased butter and fraud-butter called oleomargarine, diseased mutton, diseased horses, and the great danger of diseased humanity in partaking of such food by citizens of our own country and of other countries?

If Congress is going to regulate the cattle trade because of the disease called "pleuro-pneumonia," why should it stop with provisions to stamp out that particular disease, the existence of which, save in isolated cases, is the subject of grave disputes among the learned?

Is not the health of the vast mass of human beings who are daily eating of the flesh of cattle, hogs, and sheep, that are crushed, mangled, fevered, ulcerated, and otherwise diseased by the brutal manner of shipment over the various lines of railroad to the Eastern cities of as much moment as the interest of a cattle ring who desire the Government to help rid them of the suspicions of pleuro-pneumonia? Boards of health state that Eastern markets are filled with such most perilous stuff.

Dr. Frank Hamilton says "the present methods of bringing cattle to market" are "brutal," "inhuman," and "render their flesh unfit for use as human food."

Edwin Lee Brown, president of the Humane Association, says, in his annual address in 1881, "not one quarter of the meat sold for food is fit for human use, on account of the treatment of live-stock before it reaches the shambles."

The cattle commission of the State of New York drew a frightful picture of the sufferings of cattle in transit and of their condition upon arrival, and they inquire, "Is it possible that the meat from the fevered carcasses of such animals is harmless and healthy food for man?"

The Massachusetts railroad commissioner states: "The animals arrive at their destination trampled upon, torn by each other's horns, bruised and bleeding and suffering all that animals can suffer and live."

A committee of the aldermen and common council of Boston reported that "these meats produced diseases of various kinds."

The New York board of health, in 1869, traced the alarming prevalence of certain diseases to diseased meats. The Chicago board, in 1871, reported that "nearly one-half the beef, pork, and mutton offered for sale was diseased and unfit for food."

Another report states, "the amount of reckless barbarity toward animals and of criminal indifference to the public health on the part of many who furnish meat to consumers is so great that one almost wonders how the cities escape a pestilence."

Now, with millions of money value involved, with that matter of greater concern, the health, happiness, and lives of multitudes of our kind, involved no less than the morals of the people—for the morals of a people are the product in a large degree of the class of food partaken of as well as the surroundings otherwise affecting—why hesitate to make haste for wise measures that will bring relief?

In conclusion, I implore this House to carefully analyze this bill—first, as to the constitutional questions involved, for in this particular we should make haste slowly to open so broad a field for possible litigation; then, second, that the House shall fully consider that the vaults of the Treasury of these United States are overflowing with honest Democratic dollars, that it is the high prerogative of right for this Congress to go honestly to the doors of the said Treasury of our great Government, instead of by partisan gimlet-holes as proposed by the gentleman from Colorado, and take therefrom a sufficient sum and distribute it equitably among the several States and Territories, instead of granting especial favors to those States.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. WELLER. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, in the limited time allowed me I shall not be able to discuss this measure as thoroughly as its importance requires. I have listened very patiently to the discussion upon this bill, and I have been surprised at the statements which have been made in regard to it. One would have supposed from the discussion that this bill had originated with a committee of office-seekers, who had discovered that under the provisions of the civil-service law the possibility of getting places under the Government was becoming so remote that something new must be devised in order to enable them to get places, and that they had gotten up this bill to enable them all to find employment in the service of the Government. I can see no provisions in it which would warrant such conclusions.

It is true there is a provision in the first section of the bill that in order to enable the Commissioner of Agriculture "to collect such information on these subjects as shall be valuable to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country" he is "authorized to employ a force sufficient for this purpose."

I understand that this "force" is for the purpose of taking what might be called a cattle-census; just such a census as we have already had taken under the operation of our census law. I have taken some pains to inquire how many persons will be required for this purpose, and I believe I do not anticipate the honorable gentleman [Mr. HATCH, of Missouri] who is chairman of this committee by stating that in order to remove all possible apprehension on this subject he will submit an amendment limiting the force to twenty persons.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. At any one time.

Mr. SPRINGER. At any one time. Now, it seems to me the liberties of this people are not to be endangered by twenty census-takers looking after the cattle interests of the country. If we are threatened with danger by the presence of such a force of office-holders, I think our liberties are resting upon a very insecure foundation. That objection to this bill, it seems to me, is not worthy of further consideration.

What is the other objection to this bill? I think it is based upon the fourth section. That fourth section provides that whenever the cattle in a State or Territory are infected with this disease the President may declare such State or Territory or a part of such State or Territory in quarantine and prohibit the exportation of cattle from said State or Territory or district to other States of the Union or to foreign countries.

It is said this is unconstitutional. Unconstitutional to put cattle in quarantine? What are the quarantine laws of this country? Take the laws of any State for instance. These State laws are made binding upon all Federal officers by the acts of Congress. A physician may board any of the vessels entering any port of the United States, laden not only with merchandise or valuable goods but with persons, and that physician is required to inspect the vessel and furnish it with a bill of health before it can enter any of the ports of the country. If he finds that the passengers upon that ship are infected with a contagious disease he may put the vessel and its cargo, worth millions of dollars, in quarantine, and he may put all the persons on board that vessel, citizens of this country and of other countries, in quarantine for forty days, depriving them of their liberty and the owners of the vessel of the use of their property for that time, and that without any process of law, which we suppose is always required before a man can be deprived of his liberty or property.

Mr. WELLER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WELLER. Are not those provisions confined entirely to importation?

Mr. SPRINGER. They are so far as the quarantine laws are concerned. Of course they are to prevent disease being brought into this country. But while we all recognize the existence and the necessity for these laws upon the principle that the public health is above all other laws, yet our friends from Texas become alarmed if we undertake to quarantine a Texas steer. They seem to think that this animal should be permitted to roam at will over the country, and whoever interferes with his movements is trampling upon the liberties of the people and overthrowing the great palladium of our institutions.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to ask the gentleman one other question. Does the gentleman regard the $250,000 asked for in this bill as a measure of the interests involved?

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Iowa, in the very able speech which he has just made upon this subject, has answered his own question. If I could add anything to what he has said which would be valuable I would do so; but I know I can not. I quite agree with him in the statement he makes.

I can not see, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that there is a stretch of constitutional authority in the fourth section of this bill. Is it possible that you may detain a ship worth millions of dollars and all the people on board of it in any of the harbors of the United States, or empty its cargo out into the stream, under the quarantine laws of the country, and yet you can not prohibit cattle from being shipped from one State to another, though they carry with them an infectious disease injurious to the commercial interests of the country? I believe no such thing. I believe the power rests with Congress, in virtue of its authority under the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, to so regulate it that commerce may not become destructive of itself and of the very greatest and most valuable rights and interests of the people. What can be more damaging to people engaged in cattle-raising, as are all our people, than to spread among them a contagious disease which may result in the destruction of millions of dollars of their property? If we can not prevent this being done, then the powers of the Government have been sadly misunderstood by all who have gone before us.

Gentlemen seem to think that this is a departure from precedent. Not at all. Congress has already recognized everything that is claimed by the friends of this bill, so far as the power of Congress over this subject is concerned. I have only to read from the laws passed by the last Congress, particularly the bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government, a clause to be found on page 613, volume 22, Statutes at Large, for the purpose of showing that this is not a new subject of legislation. In that bill will be found the following paragraph:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to co-operate with State and municipal authorities, and corporations and persons engaged in the transportation of neat-cattle by land or water, in establishing regulations for the safe conveyance of such cattle from the interior to the seaboard, and the shipment thereof, so that such cattle may not be exposed to the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia, or lung-plague, and to prevent the spread of said disease, and to establish quarantine stations and provide proper shelter for neat cattle imported at such ports as he may deem necessary, $50,000.

The only objection to that statute is that the appropriation is too small. If the appropriation had been put at the amount covered by this bill, then under that clause the Secretary of the Treasury could accomplish everything that the friends of this bill desire to have accomplished under it as it is worded. I think the bill is more carefully guarded than the loose clause which I have read, because less authority than is given to the Secretary of the Treasury under that clause is given by this bill. The enlargement of the statute by this bill is a limitation upon the authority rather than an increase.

There is, therefore, less objection to this bill upon the constitutional grounds than there would be to the section already passed by Congress at its last session without any objection, as I believe, from the constitutional lawyers either of this body or of the Senate. So much, then, for the constitutional question involved in this bill. Some gentlemen always appeal to the Constitution when they want to defeat a measure. That is the universal refuge of those who have no other argument to offer against a needed measure of legislation.

I hope while the honorable chairman of the committee reporting this bill is preparing amendments to it he will also propose to strike out the proviso of section 3, which is to this effect:

Provided, That the authorities of said State or Territory shall assume and pay one-half of the expense of the valuation of the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter and one-half the cost of disinfection and necessary police regulations in the quarantine and care of infected herds of cattle.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I do not propose to strike that out.

Mr. SPRINGER. I said that I hoped the gentleman would propose it. If he does not, and I can get the opportunity, I will at the right time move to strike out that proviso, for the reason that I believe it will, in the first place, be impracticable, and, in the second place, it is unjust to the State where the effort is being made to suppress this disease to make the State bear one-half of the burden. If there is any authority on the part of Congress to deal with this question, it is in behalf of all the people of the country. If we have any right to touch it, then the duty devolves upon us, following that right, to pay our own bills as we go along, and not impose a portion of the expenses of the burden sustained in behalf of all sections of the country upon the immediate locality where this disease may be found at the time.

I fear that some gentlemen on this side of the House have not considered the magnitude of the question involved in the passage of this bill. I have taken pains to look at some of the statistics furnished by the late census in reference to the cattle industry of the country. I find that in the census year there were nearly 40,000,000 of live cattle in the country. At the low estimate of $30 a head the value of the live cattle in the country at that time would be over a thousand million of dollars.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Does not that estimate also include horses and mules?

Mr. SPRINGER. No; they are estimated under another clause.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman merely to put him on his guard. I have endeavored to obtain some facts upon this subject, and have been answered by the Census Bureau that it was impossible to give them, as the cattle were included with the horses and mules.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman will examine Table VIII, on page 141, volume 3, of the Tenth Census (1880), he will find a statement of the live-stock on farms in the United States. The aggregate on farms is as follows: Horses, 10,357,488; mules and asses, 1,812,808; working oxen, 993,841; milch cows, 12,443,120; other cattle, 22,488,550. The number of sheep and swine is given in other columns. In a note at the bottom of the page it is stated that no account, enumeration, or estimate was made or taken of animals owned by persons not cultivating farms, whether in cities and villages or not; and that the cattle on ranches and ranges as computed by special agents were, in addition to the above, as follows: Cattle, 3,750,022; sheep, 7,000,000; swine, 2,090,970. This would make the number of cattle on farms, ranches, and ranges 39,675,533. To this number must be added the milch cows in cities and villages, which were not even estimated by the census-takers. This number has greatly increased since the census was taken, now nearly four years ago.

The census will show that the butter product of the year 1879 was of great value. The number of pounds of butter made on farms was 777,255,287, in factories 29,421,784, or 806,672,071 pounds in all. At 20 cents a pound this product was worth $161,334,414. The cheese product was also of some value. There were made on farms and in factories 243,157,850 pounds of cheese in 1879, which at 10 cents a pound was worth $24,315,785. The total value of these two cattle products was worth $185,650,199. This much was added to the wealth of the country in one year from the two items of butter and cheese. We hear much of the great iron interests of the country. The product of all the iron-rolling mills of the United States in 1879 was only $136,798,574, and the product of the iron and steel mills was $296,557,685. The material used in these manufactures was worth $191,271,150. Hence the iron and steel works of the United States only added to the wealth of the country in one year $105,286,535. But butter and cheese added $185,000,000 in the same year to the wealth of the country. In order to protect the iron and steel industries from competition with foreign governments the tariff laws of the country impose a tax of $150,000,000 upon the people every year, of which only $30,000,000 finds its way into the Treasury, while the enormous sum of $120,000,000 is annually collected by the manufacturers in the increased price of iron and steel, which they are enabled to collect from the American people. The cattle interests are not asking for protection from foreign competition, but from contagious disease which foreign cattle may bring into our country and which it has already brought into some of the States. The appropriation asked is only about one-fifth of 1 per cent. of the amount of the subsidy annually given the iron and steel industries of the country. Will Congress refuse this assistance and protection?

Mr. Chairman, the Chicago stock-brokers have sent a remonstrance to Congress against the passage of this bill. I think the gentlemen who signed this remonstrance have acted hastily and without sufficient data before them. But if they have acted advisedly, are we to consider their interests or the interests of the stock-raisers of the country? I prefer to be governed by the wishes of those who produce rather than those who profit by handling cattle. I have received from my constituents, who are stock-raisers, a petition in favor of the passage of this bill, and that petition is published in the Illinois State Register of February 14, with favorable comment, as follows:

> There is much indignation among farmers in this county at the course pursued by the stock-yard dealers at Chicago in reference to the bill being considered by Congress looking toward the extermination of the much-dreaded lung-plague among cattle, called pleuro-pneumonia. The cattle-men in this county expressed much surprise that the commission-men at the stock-yards should attempt to defeat a bill having for its objects the suppression of a contagious disease that has cost England, Australia, and other cattle-breeding countries so many millions of dollars to partially suppress. The following communication to Congress is being circulated in this county and will receive the signature and indorsement of every intelligent cattle breeder and feeder:
> "To the Illinois Delegation in Congress:
> "The undersigned, having noticed with great surprise that a number of cattle-brokers and commission-men at the Chicago stock-yards have sent to Washington a protest against the passage of the bill now pending in Congress for the suppression of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases of farm stock, beg leave to represent that the bill in question was carefully drawn by a committee appointed by a convention of cattle-raisers and farmers assembled in Chicago November last. That said convention represented not brokers and commission-men, but the actual ownership of not less than $50,000,000 worth of cattle. That the most active members of that committee, those who went to Washington and assisted in framing the bill in question, to wit, Judge Carey, of Wyoming; Hon. W. J. Wilson, of Colorado; Hon. J. B. Grinnell, of Iowa; Hon. D. W. Smith, of Illinois, and General N. M. Curtis, of New York, are men of large experience, several of them being among the largest cattle-owners in America, and are all men whose suggestions are entitled to the highest consideration. We desire to express our decided conviction that the protest on the part of the Chicago cattle-brokers is based upon an entire misapprehension of the provisions of the bill, and we earnestly hope the measure may secure your hearty support. The bill in question can in no wise interfere with the cattle traffic in States not affected with contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and in these infected States to a degree no greater than is absolutely essential to the eradication of the disease."

This petition shows the feelings of the stock-raisers of the country, and also explains the origin of this bill. It was gotten up by the men who are most vitally interested in the cattle industry. This is not a measure gotten up by office-seekers or politicians. It emanates from the people, and those who claim to represent the people should think twice before they vote once against it.

The Breeder's Gazette, a weekly journal published in Chicago, as the organ of the stock-breeders of the Northwest, in its issue of January 31 has an able article in favor of this bill. I ask the careful consideration of members of the committee to the following extracts from that journal:

> It is from the West that the demand comes for protection. We have in the West more than $1,000,000,000 invested in cattle, and a large part of these cattle are handled on the ranges in such a way that if the disease once makes its appearance it would be as useless to attempt its extermination as it would be to attempt to save a powder-magazine after a spark had ignited it. This may seem an extravagant statement, but the fearful experience of Australia and South Africa prove its exact truth. The manufacturing interests of the country have received from Congress protection to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars, and the men who make carpet-tacks and lucifer matches and such trifles have amassed immense fortunes at the expense of the unprotected farmers and stockmen of the country. We see a great danger threatening us and ask, not that Congress will protect us from foreign competition, but from a malignant disease that may in a few years wipe out a thousand millions of taxable property.

That journal, speaking of the stock-raisers of the West, admonishes Congress that no half-way measures will answer. It says:

> We want it plainly understood that there is to be no child's play in this matter. We want it understood that the live-stock interest is the wealthiest and the best-organized business interest in this country, and that when we ask for bread we are not to be put off with a stone. If it is right to undertake the work of exterminating a malignant disease which has cost Great Britain and her dependencies $500,000,000 (according to the London Times) and which may cost us as much more, it is right to do the work immediately and effectually. No half-way measures will do.

It would be well for gentlemen who have agricultural constituents to heed their demands.

It is of the utmost importance to the agricultural interests of the country that every effort possible should be made to suppress diseases of domestic animals. The meat product of the United States is of immense value, and already our exports of hog products have been largely reduced by restrictions adopted by Germany and France. I have a statement in relation to the production of swine in the United States and the transportation, consumption, and exportation of hog products, prepared by Mr. Nimmo, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics. From this document it appears that the value of the exports of hog products from the United States to all countries for the year ending June 30, 1881, was $104,000,000. This was before the restrictive measures of Germany and France against the introduction of American hog products. But during the first year after such restrictions, namely, the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, the exports of our hog products fell to $82,000,000 in value, and for the year ending June 30, 1883, the value of hog products exported amounted to only $70,000,000. Thus the loss from 1881 to 1882 was $22,000,000, and from 1881 to 1883 $34,000,000, or a total loss of $56,000,000 in the value of exported hog products in the space of two years.

The pretext for the exclusion of our hog products from Germany and France was that such products were diseased and unhealthy. There is reason to believe that both these governments were well aware that our hog products were as wholesome and free from disease as like productions of any other country would be. But the fact remains nevertheless that the restrictions imposed by these governments have resulted in diminishing the exports of this Government to the extent which I have stated. It is not unreasonable to suppose that restrictions as to our cattle products may be made by European governments. England has already discriminated against live cattle from the United States, requiring them to be slaughtered at the port where they are entered, thus diminishing the value of our cattle exported to that country to the extent of perhaps $10 per head. This, in the aggregate, it is evident, amounts to a very considerable loss to the cattle interests of the country. It seems to me that it is our duty as legislators to adopt such measures as will prevent disease from coming among our domestic animals, and thus give no pretext to foreign governments to exclude our meat products on such grounds. And if a thorough system of inspection shall be adopted and measures for the suppression of pleuro-pneumonia and lung-plague carried into effect, European governments will have no cause or pretext for excluding any of our meat products.

The argument has been made against this bill that the existence of pleuro-pneumonia in cattle is not of such extent at this time as to alarm the cattle interests or call for measures such as are provided in this bill. It is an old maxim, but a good one, "that an ounce of preventive is equal to a pound of cure." It will cost but little comparatively to suppress this contagious disease now, but once let it spread to all parts of the country, and the damage will result in the loss of property worth hundreds of millions of dollars. It is the part of wise statesmanship to avert threatened dangers in so far as it is possible to do so by wise and timely legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has expired.

Mr. WELLER. I now yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JONES]. Before doing so I desire to inquire if it is understood that I have leave to print in the RECORD that portion of my remarks which I did not present to this Committee of the Whole for lack of time.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I am glad of the opportunity to vote for and to befriend this bill. The only doubt which I have had as to the propriety of giving it my vote was one which I have not heretofore heard mentioned. It was whether or not the sum of $250,000 was not more than was necessary to begin the work contemplated in this bill. But as I have heard the facts and statements which have been so carefully gathered and presented by the committee reporting this bill every doubt of that kind has been dispelled. It seems to me that the amount named is not excessive, but only a fairly decent sum to be appropriated for a very important object.

What is the situation? It appears that this disease actually exists. It exists in the District of Columbia; it exists in three or four States besides. It has infected already some hundreds, yes, some thousands of cattle. It is a contagious disease, a disease for which there is no cure but death. It exists among those classes and grades of cattle which are eagerly sought by the enterprising cattle-growers of the West to improve their herds. The disease is now confined for the most part to the cities of New York, Baltimore, and Washington, and the adjacent regions.

But let that disease be once carried from the stables of the cities to the farms of the great West, where cattle are but little confined; let it extend to the great cattle-growing States of Wisconsin, Illinois, Nebraska, and the regions farther west, and the loss which may be inflicted thereby upon our people would be simply incalculable.

We are told that when this disease found its way upon the plains of Russia the loss which it entailed was from forty to fifty millions of dollars.

It appears from the facts before us that Europe counts her losses from this disease alone by hundreds of millions of dollars; that there the dangers of the disease are well understood. European governments have taken every precaution to stay its progress, and we may well take lesson from their example. In view of the losses which other nations have suffered from the inroads of this disease, the agricultural community and the business interests of this country should look with dread and alarm upon its approach to those States which rely so much upon the cattle industry. Petitions are before us from the West which assert, and with reason, that this contagious disease might any day be carried from the stables of New York or Baltimore to the farms of Wisconsin or Illinois. If that fear should be realized there is no reason to suppose that the losses of our people would not assume equal proportions with those of the citizens of other lands.

But this is not the only aspect which this problem presents. The farmers and stock-growers of this country produce about 80 per cent. of all the exports which find their way from this country to the markets of the world. It would be an evil day for this country when the swelling surplus of our American farms should be for any long time debarred from the markets of Europe.

But already there come to us complaints from our districts and through the press that our exports of cattle and hogs are being denied entrance to Germany and France; that already owing to these causes our exports of cattle have fallen off some millions of dollars per year; that Great Britain has made such regulations that our cattle have to be slaughtered at her ports, thereby inflicting a loss of $10 or $12 in each instance, and causing during the year by this regulation alone a loss of a million of dollars to the cattle-growing interests of this country.

The situation is so serious that we can not entirely overlook it if we would. There are various methods of dealing with the problem. It has become popular to denounce the policy of Germany, of France, and of Great Britain. It seems to be the fashion to demand retaliation. From many quarters we are asked to close our ports to a portion of the products of those nations, to make war upon their commerce, because it is fancied that they have made unnecessary war upon ours. Sir, we may be compelled to adopt such a policy, but in my judgment it should be the last resort. It would be a policy better adapted to the customs of four or five hundred years ago than to the civilization of the nineteenth century. Such a policy might indeed strike a blow at the commerce of other nations, but it would inflict a far heavier blow upon the commerce of our own country.

There is one other method of dealing with these questions. That method, I believe, would be fitly inaugurated by the passage of this bill. That method is to eradicate this disease if possible; it is to adopt every plan known to civilized nations to stay its further progress. We should have such quarantine laws that the infection shall extend no further; that it shall neither find further entrance from abroad nor extend from State to State. We should have such inspection laws that we may know definitely its limits; such laws and such enforcement of them that we may know perfectly where the disease exists, and that we may be able to state officially and with authority whether diseased cattle are exported from New York or other ports to the markets of the world. Then, if we must needs enter upon the system of retaliation and restriction, it cannot be charged that we have entered upon it in reckless haste; that we have failed to adopt those safeguards and those precautions common to the other commercial nations of the earth.

Now, I have not time in the ten minutes allowed me to discuss at any length the constitutional questions involved in this bill. I should not even enter upon them but for the reason that they have been discussed at length by the opponents of the bill and none of its friends have discussed its constitutionality, except the gentleman from Illinois who has just taken his seat. It seems to me that there can not well be clearer warrant for legislation than we find in the constitutional provision upon which this bill would rest. I refer of course to that provision which gives to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations. That provision of the Constitution has long since had interpretation, the interpretation of statesmen and of jurists. Perhaps the best exposition it has ever received was that of the great statesman and lawyer Daniel Webster, whose arguments will adorn for all time the legal literature of our country. If there was any man in his generation in this country or on the globe who could give it a better interpretation it was the great Chief-Justice Marshall. We have his interpretation of this constitutional provision given more than fifty years ago in the case of Gibbons against Ogden.

In that case the constitutionality of such a law as this was not in issue, it is true, but the Chief-Justice discussed with his usual vigor and clearness the meaning of the clause I have referred to. He by no means gave it that narrow and stingy interpretation which is now claimed for it, and which would rob it of its dignity and its meaning. The court of highest resort has ever since followed that decision. Meanwhile the exigencies of commerce have developed new legislation and new decisions. Within the past few years the Supreme Court has given a still broader interpretation to that clause. The late decisions which point out the limited powers of the States to enact general quarantine laws and concede that power to Congress are in line with the interpretation given to this clause more than fifty years ago.

But the legislative branch of the Government has long given the same interpretation to this clause. In the early days of this Government Congress passed the famous embargo act. That was an act requiring for its support a far more liberal construction of this clause than the bill before us. That was not a mere regulation of commerce in a narrow sense of the word, but for the time being it was an absolute prohibition of foreign commerce, to the end that it might be protected and in a large sense regulated and preserved. That broad exercise of power was sustained by the courts as constitutional. If there were time I could point to instances from that day to this where Congress by its legislation has given the same liberal interpretation to this clause. Look at the act of 1879, designed to check the cholera and the yellow fever. By the provisions of that act the power was given to the board of health, Federal officers, to co-operate with the State authorities to stay the progress of contagious diseases. In default of action by the State authorities the board of health were given authority to make regulations of their own upon this subject; in short, to declare and enforce quarantine regulations. Their power was not confined by the law to ports of entry, but extended to every city and village of this country where it might be necessary to act. If the bill under discussion is unconstitutional, so was the act of 1879. That act forms a perfect precedent for this, and it is strange that the note of alarm was not then raised, and that that law was enacted almost, if not entirely, without opposition.

It seems to me that the decisions of the Supreme Court and the uniform legislation of Congress have long since settled this question. I interpret the meaning of those decisions and of that legislation to be this: That the States may control their domestic commerce; that they may enact their inspection and quarantine laws within reasonable and proper limits, and so far as may be necessary to control their internal affairs. But that this by no means is an exclusive power, which prevents Congress from controlling and regulating the commerce of State with State or of this nation with other nations. That is a power to which no State law is adequate; which rests only in the hands of Congress.

When the commerce of our whole people with Europe is endangered as to exports of the value of more than a hundred millions of dollars by the want of proper legislation, it would surely seem that the power of Congress had vested, if it could ever vest. Those who framed the Constitution could not have meant that this clause which gives to Congress the power to control commerce among the several States and with foreign nations should have the narrow and restricted meaning contended for by the enemies of this bill. Those men had learned by sad experience that the commerce of a government like ours must have some stronger and safer foundation than State control. They believed that there should rest somewhere an undivided power of control over the commerce of a great nation. It was this widespread conviction as much as any one cause that gave us the Government and the Union we now enjoy.

I would preserve clear and distinct the line between State and Federal authority, but I can not give to this clause the technical construction placed upon it by the gentlemen from Texas and West Virginia. I should have little respect for that government, however wide its domain or populous its cities, which had not the power to raise an army to defend its flag. I should hold in equal contempt that government which had not the power to raise a dollar to stay the progress of a dread disease.

I shall support this bill with all the more pleasure, because I believe it is desired by the agricultural community of this country. It is not often that this class ask legislation at our hands. There come to us, day by day, memorials and printed arguments from the great cities and moneyed centers, asking this or that special legislation for special classes. Each manufacturing interest in turn asks consideration or relief. Meanwhile that great mass of the people who till the soil go silently on, bearing, too willingly, the burdens of tax and tariff imposed upon them by special legislation.

Believing as I do that this bill is desired by that class of whom I have just spoken, and that it may aid in averting from them and from the entire business community very serious injury, I give it my unhesitating support.

Mr. WELLER. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will have three minutes.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. If I have but three minutes, I prefer not to occupy the floor.

Mr. WELLER. I ask the House by consent to give the gentleman five minutes in all—adding two minutes to the time yielded by me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks to occupy five minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not hesitate to say that there are provisions in this bill which do not altogether suit me, but in the main I believe it to be a correct measure. Its purpose, I think, is a commendable one.

The objection urged, however, is that this bill is unconstitutional. I hope no gentleman will now suppose that I am going to discuss the constitutional problem. Life is too brief. If every time the exploded theory of State rights, so called, is raised against the passage of just laws members are to fall into a discussion of the constitutional relations of the States, the entire session will be taken up in that fruitless business. I have been just foolish enough to suppose that this doctrine was dead and buried; that only its ghost was walking the earth, and whenever that ghost was discovered across the track of just legislation it could be thrust aside, and legislators could vote for whatever might be needed for the country's protection and the country's glory. If men have not been convinced by the logic of history on this point, they are not going to yield to the persuasions of debate in this House. If neither the masterly logic of the great Webster and the long line of statesmen who have followed his lead in the forum nor the triumphs of the sword on the field have eliminated the fallacy, of what avail is it for the underlings of our time to enter for the unequal contest? Why, sir, to listen to the discussion upon this bill a stranger to our institutions would conclude that our Constitution was formed for the express purpose of perpetuating the woes of mankind.

Gentlemen freely admit in this debate the justice of the measure and the great necessity of immediate relief, but they fall prone and helpless before the "reserved rights of the States," and cry out in utter despair that "the nation is impotent and the plague must proceed." It is also admitted that the States, even with all their reserved rights, can not reach beyond their limits to exercise a power required to "stamp out" pleuro-pneumonia, and it is conceded as well that but for the fetters and limitations of the Constitution, according to their interpretation, the nation might do so. Poor nation! Wretched people! Between statehood and nationhood all remedy fails. Onward sweeps the fell destroyer, leaving desolation as it goes, while we sit here deliberating in cold debate which of the two to choose as the forum for relief—State or nation, and both neglect! One would suppose that the very humiliation of such a spectacle would shame gentlemen into action, and that desperation would drive this ancient State-sovereignty ghost forever from their presence. Is there hope of such a consummation? Far be it from me to cherish it. I repeat, that if the persuasions of the past quarter of a century count for nothing, then though one rose from the dead to proclaim power in the Constitution gentlemen could not find it, and they would still hug their delusions with all their ancient ardor.

But, sir, at one time during the debate I thought I caught a gleam of light, by way of precedent, shining upon our way. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] was proceeding to show how on many conspicuous occasions the defenders of this most monstrous doctrine had yielded under the seductive influence of local gain (a theory which, it is said, universally shrivels into obscurity when the Treasury doors open towards the people who stand upon the dignity of the reserved rights in the States)—I say the gentleman from Iowa was with marked success, as I thought, proceeding to present many pertinent precedents to justify the passage of the bill, when lo! to his feet springs the dauntless defender (?) of the Constitution from Texas, and with triumphant tones declares that the gentleman from Iowa never had read the charter of our liberties, knew nothing of its scope, and was therefore totally unfit to cite precedent in support of this legislation. We had supposed that that gentleman was competent to give a reason for the faith within him, and that he had at least read the Constitution, but when it was publicly proclaimed by a gentleman who has not only studied the framework of our Government but has been charged with the duty of construing the organic laws of another, all argument is at an end, and States rights with their "canonized bones burst their cerements and in complete steel" stalked the Chamber like a thing of life!

To add to the triumphs of that hour, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] arose, and with his wonted vigor announced that he had ever been, was now, and ever would be a "monument" to the doctrine of States rights! If the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from New York are each for "States rights," who shall stand against them? These reserved rights of the States, then, stand square across our way. We have now but formally to surrender and run up the white flag fore and aft at once. Let the cattle die! Let pleuro-pneumonia have its victims! Let the pestilence that walketh in darkness and the destruction that wasteth at noonday run their courses! What care we, so long as we serenely slumber amid the broken "monuments" of State sovereignty? Besides, when the storm comes we can take refuge in the Constitution as declared from a Texas standpoint.

Away with care and melancholy; down with the stupid notion the deluded have so long cherished that the Constitution "commands what is right and prohibits what is wrong." This is no place—at least so men would have us believe—to vindicate rights and to contemn wrongs, to seek relief and find it! It is, according to the theory of these gentlemen, simply our duty to keep the Calhoun construction of the Constitution though it bring us to desolation's door! Go beyond this dogma but a hair-breadth even to save your country, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] will tell you again that you are invoking the "rotten remnants of the clumsy buttresses of arbitrary power."

But the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] stand not alone. The malady of State sovereignty is as catching as pleuro-pneumonia. Nearly all who oppose this bill have the disease in its most dangerous form. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] has just offered what I have no doubt seems to him the best of reasons for opposing this bill. To him it is a violent invasion of States rights; he sees certain destruction of the reserved rights of the States. If the bill fails, sir, it will be because men are frightened by this perpetual hinderance to just and proper legislation.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. There seems to be some misapprehension about the division of time, and I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JOHN S. WISE], who was promised ten minutes, may be allowed to occupy that time.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I am ready to consent to that after we have exhausted our hour.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I accept the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia, who says he will not object if it is to come in after his fifty minutes have expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and after fifty minutes have expired the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JOHN S. WISE] will be recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. HARDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am a representative of the great agricultural interest of my State, having been officially connected with the State Agricultural Society for a series of years. Of course, sir, I feel a very deep concern in every measure that is proposed here or elsewhere looking to their advancement or interest. No member on this floor has a higher appreciation of or a warmer regard for agriculture and her claims to recognition and protection than myself, and I should be grieved to do or say anything to injure that industry or damage those claims. For this reason I have struggled with my own convictions of duty to convince myself that this bill should command my support; but, sir, I have failed to discover in it sufficient merit to justify me in acting contrary to my convictions of duty to my people and to myself.

I acknowledge the object of the bill is worthy of commendation, but the grants of power in it are so broad and so dangerous and, as I believe, so repugnant to the Constitution, that I am forced, much as I commend the motives that prompted its introduction and powerful as are all appeals that are made to me in behalf of this great industry of the people, to oppose the bill as reported by the Committee on Agriculture. I regret, sir, I am forced to this position, for I would much prefer to uphold than weaken the arm that strikes a blow in this Hall to secure for agriculture what has so long been denied her—a proper recognition by the lawmakers of the country. Not that I oppose the amount appropriated by the bill, which I think, by the by, is wholly unnecessary, although the gentleman who has just taken his seat and others have heralded it to the world that there are millions of dollars being lost annually by the loss of cattle through this pleuro-pneumonia disease.

But, sir, what are the facts in that connection? I hold in my hand a report of the proceedings of the national stock-raisers' convention, containing a report written by Dr. Salmon, and what does that say? The chairman of the convention announced that Dr. Salmon, of the Department of Agriculture, had been commissioned by Dr. Loring to read a paper in this convention, and suggested that, nothing further requiring their immediate attention, they would then listen to the opinions of Dr. Salmon. What does he say?

The time has come for speaking plainly in regard to the extent and losses from pleuro-pneumonia. I have never believed, nor do I believe to-day, that anything is gained in the long run by attempting to cover up the existence of a contagious disease by whitewashing reports or by any other form of deception. But, on the other hand, I must admit that I see no virtue in exaggeration; nothing but harm in the reports of numerous losses from pleuro-pneumonia and of its existence hither and yon in thirty different States which it has never entered. So far from the direct losses from this disease reaching up into the millions, it would undoubtedly be an exaggeration to say that they amount to more than about $100,000 a year.

Now, sir, where are these losses? Dr. Salmon proceeds:

So far from its ever having reached the Western plains, there has never been a case found west of the Alleghany Mountains having the remotest resemblance to this plague, notwithstanding a pretty thorough ransacking of that great territory; and east of the Alleghanies, if you except a single farm in Connecticut, a half dozen farms in Pennsylvania, and perhaps a dozen in New Jersey, it may be truthfully said that there are no evidences of this disease at present beyond the immediate vicinity of a few large cities—New York, Brooklyn, Newark, Baltimore, and possibly Washington.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question. Does not this comport precisely with the report of the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. HARDEMAN. That does comport with it. A loss of $100,000 is all that the department has been able to find. Then why give $250,000 to prevent a loss of $100,000?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It cost Massachusetts $250,000.

Mr. HARDEMAN. Yes, and let Massachusetts, if she chooses, incur that expense again. Let her throw herself right back on her State sovereignty and do it for herself, where there are no constitutional restrictions, or if she seeks Federal assistance, let her do so in a manner that will not infringe upon her own sovereignty.

As I said before, I do not object, however, to an appropriation. Gladly would I agree to that if I could consistently and conscientiously. But I can not allow my love for agriculture or my intimate association with those engaged in it to compel me to trample upon sacred landmarks and constitutional limitations. The agriculturists of my State have more interest at stake in a proper observance and maintenance of constitutional restrictions than in any measure, I care not how beneficial its provisions or liberal its bestowments, if to secure these liberal terms they must ignore the rights of the States and violate their only safeguard and protection, the Constitution of their country.

The gentleman who spoke from my colleague's seat [Mr. SPRINGER] ridiculed the idea that we should stand upon constitutional objections. Why, Mr. Chairman, let me read to you what Junius says, in the dedication of his letters to the English nation, about regarding the constitution:

> Let me exhort and conjure you never to suffer an invasion of your political constitution, however minute the instance may appear, to pass by without a determined, persevering resistance. One precedent creates another. They soon accumulate and constitute law. What yesterday was fact to-day is doctrine. Examples are supposed to justify the most dangerous measures, and where they do not suit exactly the defect is supplied by analogy. Be assured that the laws which protect us in our civil rights grow out of the constitution, and that they must fall or flourish with it.

Yet the gentleman says that every time a party in this House have a weak cause and nothing else to say they go back upon the Constitution and its limitations. I would say to that gentleman there has scarcely ever yet been an infraction of the Constitution that it was not made to satisfy the demands of power or that it was not superinduced by the temptation of some moneyed consideration. Such are the appeals that gentlemen make to us to violate our own consciences.

But, sir, I did not rise to argue this bill. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] some days since expressed in a few words my whole opposition to it, grounded upon constitutional objections, and what he said has been ably seconded on this floor to-day by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEWART]. I only wished, because of my connection with the State agricultural society of my State, to put myself right upon the record. I wish I could vote for the measure, and were it not that I might be offensive to the committee reporting this bill, I would move, sir, to recommit it to the committee that had it in charge, in order that they might so perfect and amend it as that it should command the support of this body. But, sir, that might be considered unbecoming officiousness on my part, and I shall not make any motion of that kind, but shall simply content myself with entering my protest against this measure, so fraught in my opinion with powers dangerous to the rights of the States and with provisions repugnant to the Constitution I have sworn to obey.

I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HALSELL].

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Before the gentleman from Georgia resumes his seat will he answer me a single question?

Mr. HARDEMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I understood the gentleman to say some friend or friends of the bill had spoken of the losses by pleuro-pneumonia in this country as amounting to millions of dollars. Will the gentleman indicate to whom he referred?

Mr. HARDEMAN. That is spoken of in the report from which I quoted. It had been stated that the Department of Agriculture had estimated that there had been a loss from pleuro-pneumonia of $60,000,000, whereas this gentleman, speaking for the department, asserts that it would be an exaggeration to say that the loss amounted to $100,000 a year.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Does the gentleman say that anywhere in the report of the Committee on Agriculture accompanying this bill they refer to any such thing as a loss of $60,000,000 by pleuro-pneumonia in this country?

Mr. HARDEMAN. The gentleman from Missouri must have misunderstood me. I said the statement appears here in the proceedings of the national convention of cattle-breeders and others, as having gone out to the world from newspaper reports and assertions of alarmists, that losses from this disease reached annually into the millions when it was an exaggeration to say it had ever reached $100,000.

I now yield fifteen minutes to Mr. HALSELL, of Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDEMAN] yields fifteen minutes of his time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HALSELL].

Mr. HALSELL. Mr. Chairman, I am obliged to my friend from Georgia for his courtesy in giving me fifteen minutes of his time for the discussion of this question. I am opposed to the provisions of this bill from the very simple fact that they are unwarranted by the Constitution of the United States. It was remarked by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that it was customary when a bill was sought to be defeated that gentlemen should resort to the Constitution and make a regard for the Constitution the plea for defeating the bill.

I suppose the gentleman from Illinois is aware of the fact that we have yet a Constitution in this country guaranteeing to the people of it certain rights and privileges, and whenever there is a demand to invade the powers of that instrument then I shall always raise my voice against provisions of that character. The principles involved in this bill were settled almost a hundred years ago in the convention that framed the Constitution. The very portions that are sought to be exercised by the provisions of this bill were sought by the old Federal party to be ingrafted in the Constitution of the United States. They contended that the States ought to give up all their powers of sovereignty; that there ought to be one strong consolidated government having supreme power. There was a party in that convention, the Anti-Federalists or Republican party as they were then called, who stated that it was not right and proper that the States and the people should yield up all of their sovereign rights, and contended that they should reserve to themselves the right to regulate and control their own domestic institutions. After long and exhaustive arguments upon these principles in that convention the latter theory of government was adopted; and hence we have the dual theory of government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I said that I was opposed to this bill because there was no warrant for it in the Constitution of the United States. Let us see, and it is exceedingly important in the consideration of this bill that we do see the exact powers that this Congress has or that the Federal Government has in reference to questions of this sort. Now, sir, am I correct as to the character of government that was adopted in the convention that framed the Constitution?

Let us look for a moment and see. Perhaps I ought to beg pardon of gentlemen on this floor for calling attention to such plain provisions of the Constitution. But we can not in these times emphasize them too frequently. What are the provisions? Article IX of amendments of the Constitution reads as follows:

> The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

That provision of the Constitution shows that the States did reserve certain rights and powers which they possessed as sovereignties at the time this Constitution was formed. It shows another fact, that the Federal Government can exercise only such powers as are specifically delegated to it. In order that there might be no mistake upon the subject, so important were these great principles regarded by our fathers in reference to the future peace and prosperity of our country that they emphasized that ninth article by adopting the tenth, so that there could be no mistake about it at all. What is that tenth article?

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

There are powers which are reserved to the States, expressly so declared in that tenth article of amendments to the Constitution. I repeat that the Federal Government has no right to exercise any powers except those which are expressly delegated to it. As I remarked a moment ago, the convention that framed the Constitution having settled these grand principles, this Government started out upon the experiment of self-government. What has been the result? One hundred years have demonstrated the fact that there was no mistake in that experiment; it is no longer an experiment but a glorious reality. That old flag waves in triumph over the freest and happiest people on the face of God's green earth. And it is by reason of the fact that these great principles of government, which were regarded so sacred by our fathers, have been adhered to by the Democratic party of this country, which party is as old as the Constitution itself.

I make the declaration that there is no provision in the Constitution that that power was prohibited to the States which it is proposed to exercise by the provision of this bill. Some gentlemen say they want proof on that subject. You gentlemen hold the affirmative. In the presentation of this bill you say there is authority in the Constitution for the exercise of this power. I deny it. Can you show it? I say you have failed to do so.

But I think there is no difficulty in proving the negative, which I am not compelled to do to sustain my view of this question, because it is upon you, having presented this bill and asked to have it passed, declaring by that act that there is constitutional provision for it—it is for you to prove the affirmative.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HALSELL. Certainly.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I admit the proposition of the gentleman, and am perfectly willing to accept the challenge at the proper time. But I ask the gentleman to point out the provision in this bill which he claims is obnoxious to the Constitution.

Mr. HALSELL. In my judgment all the provisions of this bill are obnoxious to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. We now understand you.

Mr. HALSELL. I know that gentlemen claim that the powers they propose to exercise are to be found in the eighth section of the Constitution. Let us look at that section and see. That is the way to determine this question. Let us apply the features of the bill to the law as laid down in the Constitution of the country. If they can be brought within its provisions, then I am wrong; if they can not be, then you are wrong, and the bill ought not to be passed by this Congress. What is that eighth section?

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

The argument is made by some gentlemen on this floor that the power to be exercised under this bill is authorized by the expression "general welfare of the United States." Some of you take that position.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Will the gentleman indicate——

Mr. HALSELL. I have not the time. This is the first time I have had the privilege of the floor.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Will the gentleman indicate who made that argument?

Mr. HALSELL. I do not recollect. I understood that some gentleman made the argument that this bill was authorized under that provision of the Constitution. I have not heard them claim it under any other provision of the Constitution. If you deny that it is found under that eighth section, then I ask you to show where it is to be found. I make the declaration that it can not be found anywhere if not in that eighth section. I may be mistaken, for I have been so situated that I could not perhaps hear very distinctly the arguments made by gentlemen. But I understood some gentleman to make the argument just as I have stated it. Others claim that it comes under another provision of the eighth section, where Congress is authorized "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."

Mr. BAYNE. I made that argument.

Mr. HALSELL. If I am not very much mistaken the argument was made in regard to another provision. Now, I deny that the most latitudinous construction that can be placed upon that section of the Constitution can bring this bill within its provisions.

To regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

What does that mean? This eighth section authorizes Congress to—

Lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts.

That is one thing it can do.

To provide for the common defense—

That is another thing it can do.

And general welfare of the United States.

That is another thing it can do. But I deny that the provisions of this bill can be brought under that portion of section 8 of the Constitution; and I believe the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] says it is not contended.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I did not say that.

Mr. HALSELL. Then I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. BAYNE. I think the power can be derived from that source; perhaps the gentleman was thinking of my statement. That provision of the Constitution, as I contend, covers the powers proposed to be exercised by this bill.

Mr. HALSELL. I deny it; and I say that by the most latitudinous construction that can be placed upon that section this bill can not be brought within its provisions. The power with respect to the general welfare has no reference to the formation of a bureau by the Commissioner of Agriculture to ascertain the number and value of the stock in a particular State or a particular district. In other sections of the bill we have a power assumed to go into the States to investigate diseases there, to determine that there are certain diseases existing in particular localities, and to kill, if it be deemed necessary, the cattle of the people of that particular State. This is the power asserted in the bill.

The second section provides:

That the Commissioner of Agriculture is authorized to appoint two competent agents, who shall be practical stock-raisers or experienced business men, familiar with questions pertaining to commercial transactions in live-stock, whose duty it shall be, under the instructions of the Commissioner of Agriculture, to examine and report upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and to provide against the spread of other infectious and communicable diseases. The compensation of said agents shall be at the rate of $10 per diem, with all necessary expenses, while engaged in the actual performance of their duties under this act.

The meaning of which is that these agents, at a salary of $10 per day and their expenses, shall go into the States where they may suspect there are diseases among the cattle and perform police duties irrespective of the wishes of the people in those States, thus taking from them, under Federal authority, the power to manage and control their own property, and taking from them those police regulations which belong exclusively to them.

The Supreme Court has decided time and again that under the police powers of the States they can legislate for their own protection and self-defense. They can exclude persons from their limits afflicted with contagious diseases, and may also, on the same principle, exclude from their territory animals having infectious or contagious diseases.

This section of the bill, and indeed all sections of it, are police regulations, and being such, the States, as decided by the highest judicial authority of the United States, have the power to exercise these police regulations for their own protection. It follows, they having that power, it was not delegated to the Federal Government, nor prohibited to the States, but was reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. Therefore the provisions of the bill are within the reserved rights of the States. In saying that all the provisions of the bill are obnoxious to the Constitution of the United States, I do not mean to say that Congress has not power over the Territories and the District of Columbia.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] says that the powers proposed to be exercised by this bill are covered by that part of the eighth section of the Constitution which gives Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, &c. Now, sir, I admit, leaving out of view the question of police regulations, that a State has no right to prohibit importation of stock; but whenever it is necessary for the protection of the State against diseases, then the inherent power of self-protection can be exercised by the State exclusive of the Federal Government. The error, I think, into which the gentleman has fallen is in not discriminating between the police powers possessed by a State and the power possessed by Congress to regulate trade, traffic, dealing, or, in the language of the Constitution, commerce with foreign nations, and among the States, and with the Indian tribes. When these powers are kept separate as the Constitution separates them, and are exercised legitimately, there is preserved a beautiful harmony.

The fourth section of the bill provides—

That whenever a State or Territory, in any section of which a contagious or infectious disease exists which the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation, fails to make provisions for its extirpation, or to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the extirpation of such disease, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare in quarantine the said State or Territory, or such part of said State or Territory as he may deem dangerous to the animal industries of the country, and to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district.

Sir, the powers proposed in this section to be conferred on the Commissioner of Agriculture and the President of the United States are most startling. It clothes them with autocratic power. The President would have the power, if this bill is passed, upon a mere representation of the Commissioner, to punish the people of a State by declaring in quarantine said State because they have failed to do that which is exclusively within the power of the State to do. The President can say, under the power given here, that because the State authorities have failed to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner, no difference how absurd and tyrannical his plans may be, that the people of that State shall not carry their cattle to market outside of the limits of the State, but that they shall be confined there at the pleasure of the President.

Here, sir, is an attempt at centralization unequaled in the history of this country; and yet we are told that the opponents of this bill are working against the agriculturists of the country. If there is any class of citizens in whose interest I would legislate more than another, it is that class who make their living by tilling the soil. It is to them that the country must look, more than to any other, for the wealth and prosperity of the country; and yet they must lay at the feet of the power of the Commissioner of Agriculture and the President of the United States, and be deprived of the use and control of their property, because the authorities of the State fail to co-operate with the plans and purposes of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Under this section the President would have the power to declare in quarantine a whole State although there might be a disease confined to a small district of it, and the citizen hundreds of miles distant from that particular locality could be prevented from transporting his cattle to market beyond the limits of the State, and thus the whole cattle interest of the country might be at the mercy of the President.

Let us be careful, Mr. Chairman, how we touch with unhallowed hands the sacred rights of the people.

But, sir, I am opposed to the passage of this bill for other reasons besides its unconstitutionality. If there were no doubt that Congress has the constitutional power to pass this bill, I deny that there is any necessity for it. The protection of the cattle interest of the country does not require it. It simply creates more Federal officers at large salaries to annoy the people and to interfere with them in the management of their property. The States are amply able and competent to control any diseases which may make their appearance within their limits.

The remedy, sir, in my judgment, is to make more effective the national quarantine regulations already existing against foreign animal diseases by extending the period longer than by the existing law and by requiring a more rigid enforcement of the same. If I am correctly informed as to the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia, it is of foreign birth and known here only as imported.

I hold in my hand a copy of preamble and resolutions adopted at a meeting of live-stock commission dealers and others held at Exchange building, Union Stock-Yards, in the city of Chicago, on the 16th of February, 1884. I will read them, as they are entitled to great weight, having been adopted by a meeting composed of stock-raisers, feeders, owners, and dealers who are in close and constant contact with the entire animal industry of the United States, and who have close and intimate relations with raisers and feeders of live-stock. They are as follows:

Whereas the present condition of the foreign trade in our live-stock is extremely unsatisfactory and must result in great loss to the animal industry of this country, as soon, with abundant corn and grass crops, we shall have a surplus of meat food; and

Whereas for several years past sundry meddling and officious persons have, under quasi-official position, extensively and continuously circulated false and exaggerated reports of the diseased condition of our live-stock, which reports have been and are accepted abroad as representing the true condition of the health of our live-stock, and the policy pursued the past few years by the persons circulating such false or exaggerated reports has been followed by the total expulsion of our pork product from the German Empire, France, and other foreign countries, and the possible early total exclusion of our live cattle from English markets, and such unfavorable condition of affairs has resulted in damage to the live-stock interest of this country heretofore to the extent of millions of dollars; and

Whereas history teaches us that any and all cases of contagious lung-plague and foot-and-mouth disease in the United States may be traced directly to importations of live-stock from Europe, and during the year 1883 upwards of 5,000 head of cattle were imported into this country from different countries in Europe, which countries are known to be extensively infected with contagious animal diseases, and the term of quarantine enforced against such importations (ninety days from date of shipment) has been proved to be ineffectual against contagious lung-plague, and such quarantine has been known to be evaded on more than one occasion: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That this meeting does earnestly protest against such false or exaggerated statements going forth under a semi-official indorsement, and that it is the sense of this meeting that the administration of a department of our Government, by which such condition of affairs obtains is wrong and should be remedied, to the end that our live-stock and meat trade abroad may be placed on a sound basis.

Resolved, That the stockmen here assembled, being stock-raisers, feeders, owners, and dealers, and being in close and constant contact with the entire animal industry of the United States, and by virtue of such intimate relations with the raisers and feeders of live-stock being well informed as to the general health of the same, do hereby declare that the cattle and hogs of this country have not been for many years in so universal good health, and that from the active and tenacious character of contagious lung-plague this meeting does not understand how it can have prevailed for past years in Eastern States and yet be still confined to a few restricted localities on the Atlantic seaboard, as the movement of cattle in Eastern markets is in and out constantly from stock-yards and cities, and as there has never been a single case of contagious lung-plague west of the Alleghanies, notwithstanding the unrestricted movement of hundreds of thousands of our native cattle to the West from the States east of us.

Be it furthermore resolved, That it is not from our own cattle but from these large importations of cattle from Europe this country should look for danger of infecting the vast herds of the West, and that the danger therefrom is imminent, and that the quarantine against foreign animal diseases is ineffectual by reason of too short a period of quarantine and loose manner of enforcing the same, and that when live-cattle are allowed to come in the period of quarantine should be extended to not less than one hundred and eighty days, counting from the day of debarkation, and in this case there should be such provision made as will insure the total isolation of each and every importation during the time of such quarantine.

Resolved, That a printed copy of these proceedings be sent to the President, Secretary of the Treasury, and each member of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and be furnished the press for publication.

It seems to me, sir, that the recommendations are wise, and would no doubt accomplish the objects sought by the advocates of this bill and save the enormous expense which would most certainly result from the creation of the bureau contemplated in this bill. There is no doubt, sir, that the dangers from the disease of pleuro-pneumonia have been greatly exaggerated. The history of the country shows that not a single case of it has ever appeared west of the Alleghany Mountains, and it seems strange, if it exists east of the Alleghanies and has for many years, as claimed by some, that there should never have appeared a case in the West, notwithstanding there are hundreds of thousands of cattle constantly shipped to the West from the East. Sir, I have the honor of being one of the Representatives from the State of Kentucky on this floor, in which State there are perhaps more thoroughbred cattle than in any other State in this Union, and I am sure that she is able and willing to take care of and protect them, and would not be willing to have a law passed authorizing the Commissioner of Agriculture to appoint agents to go into the State and take charge of and control her cattle interest; and that is actually what is meant by the second section.

Sir, I, as one of the Representatives of the proud people of that grand old State, enter my solemn protest against the passage of a bill so humiliating to them as this would be.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROADHEAD] for twenty minutes.

Mr. BROADHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to differ with my friend and colleague from Missouri [Mr. HATCH], the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, who advocates this bill; but to me, entertaining the views that I do in regard to the provisions of the bill, it is the most objectionable measure that has been introduced in this Congress.

The advocates of the bill claim that there is an existing or impending calamity afflicting the stock of our country. They claim that the States are so impotent that they have not the power to afford a remedy, and therefore we must appeal to the Government of the United States to protect us.

The question has been raised as to the constitutional power of Congress to pass such a law. We are met with a declaration, if I did not misunderstand the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the rights of the States have been buried long ago. When the question of constitutional power is raised gentlemen ridicule the idea and say that we have passed a public-health law; that Mr. Jefferson purchased the territory of Louisiana in 1803 without any constitutional authority; that various other matters have been passed which were not in strict accordance with the provisions of the Constitution; and therefore I suppose we may violate the Constitution again and whenever it suits our convenience. That is the argument. Power grows by what it feeds upon. One step taken in the exercise of arbitrary and unauthorized power gives an excuse if not a justification to claim still greater powers. That is one of the principles of human nature. The man who has acquired power loves it as the avaricious man loves his money. I say that the States in regard to a question of this kind have ample power to protect themselves against this disease if it exists, and that the Federal Government has no such power as is claimed in this bill.

Gentlemen are mistaken when they quote the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Texas cattle case, which came from my own State of Missouri, in support of the assertion that the States are without power. Did the Supreme Court in that case undertake to say that the Constitution of the United States has denied to the States the power to pass laws on this subject? Mr. Chairman, the court has expressly declared the contrary. The law under consideration in that case was an absolute prohibition of the importation of stock into the State of Missouri during certain months of the year without regard to the question whether the stock was diseased or not. The Legislature of Missouri having undertaken to prohibit absolutely the importation of Texas cattle, Mexican cattle, and Indian cattle into that State during a certain period of the year, the Supreme Court of the United States declared that this was a power which involved the regulation of commerce among the States—and so it is—and that it belongs to Congress. But what else did the court say in the same case? I allude to the case of the Railway vs. Husen, 95 United States Reports, page 471.

That court says:

It may also be admitted that the police power of a State justifies the adoption of precautionary measures against social evils. Under it a State may legislate to prevent the spread of crime, pauperism, or disturbance of the peace. It may exclude from its limits convicts, paupers, idiots, and lunatics, and persons likely to become a public charge, as well as persons afflicted by contagious or infectious diseases; a right founded, as intimated in the Passenger cases (7 Howard, 283), by Mr. Justice Grier, in the sacred law of self-defense. The same principle, it may also be conceded, would justify the exclusion of property dangerous to the property of citizens of the State; for example, animals having contagious or infectious diseases. All these exertions of power are in immediate connection with the protection of persons and property against noxious acts of other persons, or such a use of property as is injurious to the property of others. They are self-defensive.

And yet it is claimed that the States have no such authority, and therefore the strong arm of Federal power must be invoked to protect us against this alleged evil. The highest judicial authority in this Government has decided otherwise, and I say that whatever may be the power of the Federal Government in this respect it ought not to be exercised so long as the States may exercise it and make it effective, and we have the authority of gentlemen who have discussed this question that it has already been effectively exercised by several States; and if it has failed in other instances it is because laws can not always be made effective, whether passed by the State or National Government.

The Constitution has declared that no State shall without the consent of Congress lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports except such as may be necessary to execute its inspection laws. In other words, a State may impose duties upon exports and imports to the extent necessary to enforce its inspection laws. So that Pennsylvania, Ohio, Missouri, Illinois, or any other State may pass laws to prevent the introduction of diseased cattle in its respective limits; it may appoint inspectors to inspect cattle; it may levy duties upon imports or exports for the purpose of carrying into effect its inspection laws. All this is directly within the provision of the Constitution. Such laws are police regulations, the enactment of which belongs to the States alone; just as this bill is a police regulation, and as such comes within the purview of State authority. No such power is possessed by the Federal Government, according to the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, whose judges in the interpretation of these powers have certainly gone as far as in their consciences they conceived they could go in a fair, just, legitimate interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution.

The States have the power to make and enforce police regulations. Why is it so? It is because the exercise of the police power is the exercise of the highest attribute of sovereignty which can belong to any government under our system, and the Government of the United States, from the nature of its Constitution, can not exercise the highest attribute of sovereignty. I speak now of those powers which are necessary to regulate the internal affairs of a State, to protect the property, the lives, the liberty, and the health and comfort of its citizens; it is a defensive power, and, as declared by an eminent judge, it is much easier to perceive and realize the existence and sources of it than to mark its boundaries or prescribe limits to its exercise; and the courts have gone so far as to hold that it may in its exercise override that provision of the Constitution which declares that no law shall be passed impairing the obligation of contracts. This is a prerogative of government that belongs to the States and was reserved to the States by that provision of the Federal Constitution which declares that all powers not granted to the General Government nor denied to the States are reserved to the States respectively and to the people.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROADHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Does the gentleman contend that the States have the power to pass a law which would prohibit the transportation of cattle from one State to another?

Mr. BROADHEAD. Most unquestionably they have, as a police regulation. Most undoubtedly, Mr. Chairman, under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to which the gentleman has referred in his report they would have such a power in order to prevent the spread of contagious diseases.

Now, what does the Supreme Court of the United States say in regard to the question of police power? Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the court in the Slaughter-house cases, says:

The powers here exercised by the Legislature of Louisiana is, in its essential nature, one which has been, up to the present period in the constitutional history of this country, always conceded to belong to the States, however it may now be questioned in some of its details.

It always was conceded.

Unwholesome trades, slaughter-houses, operations offensive to the senses, the deposit of powder, the application of steam-power to propel cars, the building with combustible materials, and the burial of the dead may all—

Says Chancellor Kent—

be interdicted by law, in the midst of dense masses of population, on the general and rational principle that every person ought so to use his property as not to injure his neighbors, and that private interests must be made subservient to the general interests of the community.

This—

is called the police power. * * * This power is and must be from its very nature incapable of any very exact definition or limitation. Upon it depends the security of social order, the life and health of the citizen, the comfort of an existence in a thickly populated community, the enjoyment of private and social life, and the beneficial use of property.

It belongs to the State. It does not belong to the Federal Government except in that terrritory over which the Government has exclusive jurisdiction, in the District of Columbia, in arsenals and dock-yards, and perhaps in the Territories belonging to the United States. But this prerogative, the power of establishing police regulations, does not belong in a general sense to the Government of the United States, certainly not within the territorial limits of the States. As soon as it is taken away from the States their existence as independent communities is absolutely destroyed.

But, referring further to this question, I wish to call the attention of the House to the decision of Chief-Justice Marshall interpreting that part of the Constitution which I have just quoted in regard to the inspection laws in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, quoted by Judge Miller in the Slaughter-house cases. He says:

Chief-Justice Marshall, speaking of inspection laws passed by the States, says: "They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which controls everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government, all of which can be most advantageously administered by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, &c., are component parts. No direct general power over these objects is granted to Congress, and consequently they remain subject to State legislation."

And further says the Supreme Court in the Slaughter-house cases:

The exclusive authority of State legislation is strikingly illustrated in the case of the City of New York vs. Milne, (11 Peters). In that case the defendant was prosecuted for failing to comply with a statute of New York which required every master of a vessel arriving from a foreign port to report the names of all his passengers, with certain particulars of their age, occupation, last place of settlement, and place of birth. It was argued that this act was an invasion of the exclusive right of Congress to regulate commerce; and it can not be denied that such a statute operates at least indirectly upon the commercial intercourse between the citizens of the United States and of foreign countries. But, notwithstanding this, it was held to be an exercise of the police power, properly within the control of the State, and unaffected by the clause of the Constitution which conferred on Congress the right to regulate commerce.

If this question were raised before the Supreme Court I do not know to what extent they might now go. But they have not yet gone to the extent of declaring that the power to regulate commerce gives to Congress the power to establish police regulations.

It is so maintained by some law writers, but the courts have not yet so decided, but on the contrary they have intimated otherwise. What may be the decisions hereafter I am not prepared to say, but so far as the question exists now the States are amply protected in the power of establishing such police regulations that may be necessary to guard against the spread of this disease beyond where it now exists, and that power extends to absolute prohibition of the introduction in or transportation through a State of any cattle which may be found to be diseased by persons appointed by the State to make an inspection of them.

I wish I had time, Mr. Chairman, to argue this question more fully. I desire, however, to call attention briefly to some other considerations connected with the bill. I think, sir, that the mere agitation of the subject, the bringing of the question before the House at this time, has done the stock and agricultural interests of this country more injury than all the cases of pleuro-pneumonia that ever existed in this country from the time the disease was first discovered down to this hour.

Let me read an extract from a letter which I have received—I do not know the gentleman who writes it, but he claims to be the president of the College of Veterinary Surgeons of the State of Pennsylvania—a letter written only a few days ago, in which he says:

I have been in practice in this State for twenty-six years, and have seen and treated all classes of diseases, but never met with a case of contagious pleuro-pneumonia; and in view of the restrictions upon our live-stock by England and the prohibition upon our hog products by France and Germany, I consider the bill an outrage upon our people, and if it passes it will not only give foreign nations a good excuse to virtually interdict our cattle trade abroad, but will destroy it.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Will the gentleman be kind enough to give the name?

Mr. BROADHEAD. Yes, sir; you can have the whole letter and read it yourself.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I only wish to know the name of the writer.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I say that I do not know anything about him, but that he signs himself as president of the College of Veterinary Surgeons of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Will you just be kind enough to read his name?

Mr. BROADHEAD. Yes, sir; he signs his name James McCoart.

But now, sir, to the provisions of this bill. My objection is that the bill increases the powers of this Government beyond what is safe for the interests of the people of this country, and I tell my friends on this side of the Chamber if they wish to add to the already overshadowing power of this Central Government, let them vote for the bill; if they wish to increase the army of office-holders which is subsidized annually for political purposes and sent out in detachments to the various parts of the country to control elections, let them support this bill; if they wish to obliterate the lines which separate Federal from State authority, let them support this bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. As we propose to limit the number appointed under the bill to twenty, that can not be a very serious objection.

Mr. BROADHEAD. Well, twenty is not a great number, to be sure, provided you stop there. But how many bureaus are you to establish? Where is the Government to stop in the establishment of these different bureaus? Can the gentleman tell me that?

But let us look at this bill further. Here is a provision of the third section. It gives the Commissioner of Agriculture power "to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of said diseases and to certify such rules and regulations to the executive authority of each State and Territory, and invite said authorities to co-operate in the execution and enforcement of this act."

That is in effect to empower the Commissioner of Agriculture to establish and provide a code of laws himself to govern the cattle trade and certify that code to the different States and Territories; and if they do not comply with it he is authorized, under the provisions of this bill, to take the matter in hand, enforce his regulations, employ such force as may in his opinion be necessary for that purpose, kill diseased cattle and pay for them, and prohibit the shipment of cattle from one State into another State or Territory. It does not require that he shall ask the Congress of the United States to authorize him to do this. It does not require that he shall ask the heads of the department to which he belongs to ask the President of the United States; but he is to make his own rules and regulations, which are to be absolute law, from which there is to be no appeal; and if the States and Territories do not enforce his regulations, then he takes the whole matter under his own jurisdiction, places himself above the law, State or Federal, and takes control of the cattle business of that State under such regulations as he may establish for this bureau of animal industry.

That is not the only provision of the bill to which I would like to refer. The tenth section of the bill provides:

That it shall be the duty of the several United States district attorneys to prosecute all violations of this act which shall be brought to their notice or knowledge by any person making the complaint; and the same shall be heard before any district or circuit court of the United States or Territorial court holden within the district in which the violation of this act has been committed or the person or corporation resides or carries on or has his or its place of business.

If an offense against this law is committed in the State of Pennsylvania and the person who committed the offense happens to be a stock-raiser in the State of Texas, the prosecution against him may be made under this provision of the law in the State of Texas, in his own State it is true but away from the district or State where the offense was committed, distant from the witnesses who may testify to the facts of the case, and in violation, I undertake to say, of every principle of criminal law, if not in violation of the Constitution itself, which provides:

The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed.

It may be tried anywhere, not alone where the offense is committed, which is the principle in regard to criminal offenses, but anywhere that he may reside or carries on his business. There are many other objections to the bill. It bristles, Mr. Chairman, all over with objectionable provisions. It increases the powers of the General Government, which have already been increased and are increasing from day to-day beyond the limits of the Constitution. It violates the provisions of the Constitution, as I take it, being a denial to the State of the powers lodged in it by the Constitution. It affirms the power of the General Government to establish police regulations by Congress under the power to regulate commerce between the States, which I deny. There is no authority either in the decisions of the courts or the principles of our fundamental law for such an exercise of power.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized seven minutes.

Mr. POTTER. In the short time allowed me I shall not be able to say much. I wish, however, to emphasize as well as I am able the words that have already been uttered. In reply to the gentleman behind me who has suggested that he supposed the rights of the States—I presume he means the domestic rights of the people of the States—had not survived the war, I had thought, sir, that the late war was conducted for the purpose and to the end and effect that the rights of all the States should remain equal, with their dignity, equality, and power undiminished. I understand, sir, that to that end the late struggle was conducted and in that end it has resulted.

If there is any State right greater than all others it is that the Union of these States under and within the Constitution should remain in immortal vigor and strength forever. The highest of all State rights is the perpetuity of this Union within and in obedience to the Constitution.

Now, sir, what does this bill do? It invades the domestic life, the domestic concerns of the States, and it undertakes by a system of espionage to enter our cattle-yards, our very domestic homes, upon our farms, and to regulate them by a corps of officials sent from the central capital of the United States. I say, sir, this is not within any powers ever granted to the General Government. The powers of the General Government are not only consistent with the rights of the States; they were created, and that Government was endowed with its powers, great as they are—I pray God they may be immortal—to the end and for the purpose of establishing and maintaining forever by the strength of the continent the powers and the rights of self-government in the people of the individual States of this Union. It was for that purpose that the guarantee was given to the States, that by the power of the whole continent they should be protected against invasion, or intrusion, or interference forever, except as to the powers they had contracted to exercise jointly as one sovereign people.

Let it never be forgotten, let us ever renew our memory of it, that the States have parted with no sovereignty to the General Government. We have contracted together under a form of government a compact by which over certain subjects we are to exercise our sovereignty together, and that is all. As sovereigns the Representatives from New York vote here and exercise their powers here on the subjects commmitted to the direction of this Congress. When we consented to delegate that sovereignty to the Congress of the United States, or to a General Government, we did it in order that we might exercise a sovereign power and a sovereign influence forever over the concerns of the entire continent in exact proportion to our numbers; and we intend to exercise it forever.

Now, sir, this bill, under the guise of preventing the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, does what? Why, it undertakes to appoint a board to inspect all the domestic animals of the country, to ascertain their diseases, their condition, their value, their care, their protection, and the uses to which they are put. It undertakes to do this by a national board. It is said to be limited to twenty.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JOHN S. WISE], as directed by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. When this bill was first introduced it did not attract my attention particularly. But as the discussion has progressed I have discovered that it bears immediately upon a large interest in my State, represented by six hundred and eighty-odd thousand head of horned cattle, valued at about $15,000,000, owned chiefly in the valley and southwestern portion of Virginia, and that they are immediately contiguous to the region in which this disease is located.

In this debate several undisputed facts have been developed. It has been developed here that the horned cattle of this country number 40,000,000, of the value of one thousand million dollars; that the foreign exports of cattle and other cattle products yearly amount to forty-odd millions; and that the loss occurring directly from apprehension in foreign ports, as to the existence of this disease amounts to millions annually.

We have heard that our trade is threatened by the action of Germany, of France, and of England. We have heard that at home, in the effort to improve our flocks and herds by importation, we have been bringing this disease, well known in Europe, to our shores, and that we are in danger of its spread. It is a disease of well-defined type and easily recognizable, which skilled veterinarians declare is present upon the Atlantic slope. We are told, sir, that one cow introduced into Africa, affected with pleuro-pneumonia, spread contagion through the whole northern portion of that continent, destroying millions or hundreds of millions of dollars. We are told that in Russia it ravages whole sections. We are told, and nobody has denied it, that England spent and lost five hundred millions of dollars before she could extirpate that disease. We are told that it is in this country in five States, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Maryland. And we are asked to appropriate $250,000 only to start the experiment of extirpating this disease. The bill to meet this end has been carefully prepared and digested in committee and is now presented for our approval.

We are met here—not so much with a denial of these facts above recited; nor is it denied that twenty-two States of this Union, either by their Legislatures or by large cattle associations, are here praying Congress to take charge of the subject as a national and international importance—but ever and anon we hear the cry that the measure is unconstitutional. As this debate has progressed the feature of it which has struck me most is this, that the three States most boisterous about the Constitution, most zealous, apparently, of Federal power, are Louisiana, Texas, and West Virginia. Louisiana, bought with the money out of the pocket of this nation and freed after centuries of servitude to Spain and France, has no reason to live in eternal apprehension of Federal power. Texas, bought with the blood and treasure of this country, it seems to me has something for which to feel grateful and kindly toward this nation for relieving her from Mexican anarchy instead of perpetually coming here and cackling "States rights" like a Guinea bird frightened off her nest. And as for West Virginia, whose Representative here saw fit unprovokedly to take a fling at old Virginia, I want to tell him that his little State is nothing but the bastard offspring of a political rape committed upon poor old Virginia, cut from her by a Cæsarian operation by the Federal Government. Why should she be jealous of Federal power except on the principle that bastards always hate their sires? The gentleman from West Virginia in all that he has said has talked as if he lived in another country than the United States, and I have observed from the moment he took his seat on this floor that he has seemed to consider that we lived in the United States and he lived in West Virginia. [Laughter.] I do not believe any country in this land is good enough for him. He once lived in Virginia. He went away from her to West Virginia, there to evince an eternal jealousy of the United States. I think, sir, the gentleman is on his way to Blennerhassett's Island, where, like Aaron Burr, he can start a government to suit himself, where he can speak not only every day as here but all day also. [Laughter and applause.]

We also hear these constitutional scruples from the gentleman who has just taken his seat, the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER], who is alarmed at the encroachments of the Federal power. Yet it was but yesterday that this thoroughgoing, State-rights, strict-construction Democrat was distributing to our desks the proof of and pluming himself upon being the author of the national banking law. Now, I want to know what sort of strict-construction Democracy it was that conceived the national banking law? Was it the John Tyler Democracy or the Andrew Jackson Democracy?

For my part I am tired and sick of this hair-splitting and eternal apprehension about invading the Constitution. The bill which is now before us, and which has been reported from a committee of this House, undertakes to deal with a matter of interstate traffic, of international traffic. It undertakes to provide that we shall be safe in the possession of healthy stock at home and shall put the stamp of this great nation upon our foreign exports. What would a German or a Frenchman know of a certificate from West Virginia that the cattle there were sound? He probably never heard of West Virginia. When our cattle go abroad we want the American flag to float over them as a certificate that they go in a sound condition.

The secret of all this trouble and loss is that you never can get and never will get State action upon it. Some of the States are able to act if they would, but I can only say for the poor old State of Virginia that she has as much as she can do to pay what she owes now. If her sons who are in West Virginia, instead of abusing and throwing mud at her, would only remember that they have never paid a dollar of their share of her debt, as the constitution of West Virginia requires them to do, and would now pay it, then perhaps we would get proud in Virginia, clamor for our constitutional rights, and ourselves pay for such cattle as might be destroyed there under the provisions of this bill. But even then measures to regulate the commerce between the States would be indispensable to make the laws effectual.

I heard my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. COX], and I am proud to call him my friend, boasting the other day that he was a sort of shining light, a monument of Democracy, to point out these doctrines of State rights and strict construction. I accept, I will say to the gentleman, his own designation of himself. I will not call him a monument, but I would call him a pillar of brass by day and a pillar of gas by night [laughter] to lead the wandering tribes of latter-day Democracy out of the desert in which they have been lost for lo! these many years. He is, it is true, ever and always untangling some nice crotchet of strict construction for an admiring throng of State-rights followers.

You do not get any thanks for it, my friend. When you go in for a Southern appropriation you are all right; but when your constitutional scruples trouble you about such a thing, then you are all wrong. Here is an editorial from a Bourbon journal, the Vicksburg Herald. Hear what it says to you:

COX, and Democrats like him, are opposed to aiding us in any way. They opposed the appropriation for the Mississippi River, and COX even went so far as to oppose the Government protecting the South from the cholera and yellow-fever.

And then it goes on to say:

We know there are some in the South ready to smooth over such things. In our opinion that is a great blunder. It is a blunder for the South to maintain party relations with men opposed to her material interests. The President who urged an appropriation for the Mississippi River and who is in favor of an effective national quarantine is entitled to our thanks and our support, but if Mr. SAM COX and men who agree with him are entitled to either we can't see why.

I have seen here in this House bills introduced by these old State-rights shriekers not only to regulate interstate traffic but to macadamize every little road in Virginia that runs from a depot to a Federal cemetery, and you never hear "State rights" once. The other day, when the question of giving $300,000 to the Ohio sufferers came up, the first man who took me by the arm and asked me to help them pass the appropriation was the distinguished State-rights Democrat from West Virginia. I did vote for it, because I believe a great Government like ours strong enough to slay thousands to save itself is strong enough under its Constitution to save thousands and provide for the general welfare.

But if I had thought of it at the time I would have said to my narrow-gauged friend from West Virginia, I will vote for the bill only with this amendment, that the men who have this money in charge shall get on the lines between Kentucky and West Virginia, between Ohio and Indiana, between Indiana and Illinois, and with boat-hooks in their hands, never leaving the State lines, sticking to the lines where the States run so as not to invade their sovereignty, fish the drowning people out of the water as they pass.

I for one stand here and say that I am heartily weary of seeing this little bantam chicken, State rights, brought up here and pitted against the heavy rose-combed game-cock, the Union, for he is knocked into smithereens every time. [Laughter]. My father once said that Virginia had neglected her material interests and dwelt entirely upon abstractions, until her people, instead of feeding her cattle on a thousand hills, were compelled to chase the stump-tailed steer through the sedge patch to get a tough beefsteak. [Great laughter.] No sadder truth was ever told about her, although it was ludicrously put.

I believe our people, after a hundred years of puzzling over strict construction, have at last remembered what George Washington preached to them while living and left them as a legacy with his dying breath, namely: That this is their Union, filled with infinite love and succor and power to build them up, and that no policy could be more narrow, bigoted, or suicidal than to live in eternal jealousy and apprehension of their best friend.

In my opinion this bill is clearly constitutional and of great and immediate concern and benefit to my section. I will support it cheerfully, and hope it may pass.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, as the hour is late and the time fixed for debate almost exhausted, to print in the RECORD the remarks I would have made had opportunity offered.

There was no objection, and leave was given accordingly. [See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed by the order of the House for general debate on this bill has now expired.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONVERSE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals, and had come to no resolution thereon.

COMMITTEE ON THE TENTH CENSUS.

The SPEAKER, in pursuance of the action of the House, announced the appointment of the following as members of the Select Committee to Ascertain the Results of the Tenth Census.

Mr. S. S. COX of New York, Mr. WILLIAM C. OATES of Alabama, Mr. JOHN B. STORM of Pennsylvania, Mr. HUGH BUCHANAN of Georgia, Mr. JAMES H. JONES of Texas, Mr. JOHN J. KLEINER of Indiana, Mr. WILLIAM WALTER PHELPS of New Jersey, Mr. EBEN F. STONE of Massachusetts, Mr. RICHARD GUENTHER of Wisconsin, Mr. NEWTON W. NUTTING of New York, Mr. ROBERT R. HITT of Illinois, and Mr. JOHN S. WISE of Virginia.

DISTILLED SPIRITS IN BOND.

Mr. MORRISON. I am directed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report a bill to extend the time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits now in warehouse. I am requested to say, and perhaps I ought to say, that this is not a unanimous report.

The bill (H. R. 5265) was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky. I call for the reading of the report accompanying this bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. The bill is not before the House for consideration.

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky. Is it not in order to have the report read?

The SPEAKER. The bill, with the report, goes, under the rule, to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The bill is not now before the House for consideration.

PRINTING OF EVIDENCE BEFORE A COMMITTEE.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to offer for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the evidence taken by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice be printed, and that 100 extra copies of such evidence be printed for the use of the committee.

Mr. REED. Is this the unanimous wish of the committee?

Mr. SPRINGER. I am requested by the committee to have this evidence printed. There is no objection in the committee. I will state that a number of gentlemen have desired copies of evidence taken by the committee, and the making of manuscript copies costs quite a large sum of money. Thus far the evidence is only in manuscript.

Mr. RANDALL. The expense of this printing will not exceed $500, I suppose. If it will, the proposition must go under the rule to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SPRINGER. The extra copies will not cost anything like that.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VOTING BY DELEGATES IN COMMITTEES.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to offer a resolution which I think is privileged, and I ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will determine whether it is privileged or not.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Delegates from the Territories, on any question arising before any committee of which they are members, be allowed to vote and have their votes recorded as members of such committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think this a privileged matter. It is contrary to the law; and, in the opinion of the Chair, the House could not, by a simple resolution, change the law upon the subject.

Mr. KEIFER. Let it go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire a moment to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KEIFER. There is.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it go to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado desires to make a statement, the objection being reserved.

Mr. BELFORD. I wish to make a statement, because it is important to determine this question one way or the other.

Mr. RANDALL. It is proper the resolution should have the consideration of a committee before being acted on by the House.

Mr. BELFORD. But I hope my friend from Pennsylvania will allow me to make a statement touching the necessity of this proposition.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not interfering with the gentleman's speech. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BELFORD. I hope gentlemen will allow me to make a statement, because this is really an important matter.

The SPEAKER. There is no objection, as the Chair understands, to the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BELFORD. Well, I would like to make a statement, and if I may have just three minutes I will do so. [Cries of "Go on!"] To-day we had a meeting of the Committee on Public Lands. The committee was equally divided—five one way and five another.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the statement which the gentleman is about to make.

Mr. BELFORD. Then I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Rules.

EXPENSES OF BOYNTON INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution for immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, all the expenses incurred by the committee appointed to investigate charges against H. V. Boynton.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. RANDALL. What amount of expenditure is proposed?

Mr. HOPKINS. Probably a word of explanation is necessary.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I think the resolution had better go to a committee.

Mr. HOPKINS. Several witnesses summoned before our committee under the subpœna of the Speaker have attended, supposing that they would be paid. But there is no provision for their pay. Two of them come from a distance. The Clerk informs me it is necessary this resolution should be passed in order to authorize their payment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HOPKINS. The fees for witnesses are fixed by law; but in this case there is no appropriation for their payment.

Mr. KEIFER. I suggest that this expenditure from the contingent fund of the House might be authorized by a House resolution instead of a joint resolution. It is necessary that the contingent fund of the House be provided through an appropriation made by law; but the assent of the Senate is not necessary in order to pay money out of that contingent fund.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the gentleman will look at the statute he will find that he is mistaken.

Mr. KEIFER. I made the statement without examining it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the introduction of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 168) for the payment of certain expenses out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the Virginia contested-election case.

Mr. MORRISON. I move the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion until I can have the pension bill for soldiers of the Mexican war reprinted.

Mr. MORRISON. I will yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must either insist on his motion or withdraw it, as the regular order is demanded on both sides of the House.

Mr. MORRISON. I withdraw it.

SOLDIERS OF MEXICAN WAR, ETC.

On motion of Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. 3762) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war and others therein named, and for other purposes, was ordered to be reprinted, the first print having been exhausted.

VIRGINIA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. BLAND. I ask by unanimous consent that Senate bill 380 be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the report of the Committee on Elections on the contested case in the State of Virginia.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. It is not the desire of the committee to take up that case at this late hour. The gentleman in charge of it desires it to go over.

Mr. COSGROVE. I move the House do now adjourn.

RIVERS AND HARBORS COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, asked, in behalf of Mr. WILLIS, chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, for leave to that committee to sit during the sessions of the House until otherwise ordered.

There was no objection, and it was agreed to accordingly.

Mr. COSGROVE'S motion was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 25, 1884.

Prayer by Rev. S. MITCHELL HARTSOCK, of the city of Washington.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 14th instant, a report from the Chief of Ordnance, showing the "number, caliber, weight, and value of all cast-iron cannon on hand condemned or unfit for use and not heretofore disposed of or appropriated;" which was, together with the accompanying papers, on motion of Mr. COCKRELL, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the 7th instant, a report of the so-called Selfridge board, appointed to examine the torpedo machinery of the Destroyer and other papers in that Department relative thereto; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, transmitted to the Chair by the executive of that State, on the subject of a bill pending before the Senate. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution relative to railroads from Marquette and Ontonagon to State line.

Whereas, June 3, 1856, Congress made a grant of land to the State of Michigan to aid in constructing two railroads, one from Marquette to the Wisconsin State line and another from Ontonagon to same point, said grant on condition that the roads should be built within ten years or the land revert to the United States; and

Whereas Congress, by joint resolution approved July 5, 1862, changed the route of first-named road, granting lands therefor, thus abandoning one of original lines, and along the other no road has been built; and

Whereas relinquishments were made by the State in due form to the lands along both the original lines. After ten-year limitation had expired, and the State had relinquished as above stated, the Land Department treated the land as other public land, and sold them as such, receiving pay therefor, over 800,000 acres of the same being sold, large quantities being owned by citizens of Ohio, said lands being rich in mineral, agricultural, and lumber products; and

Whereas it being recently discovered that all these titles granted by the Government are endangered: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and are hereby, requested to vote for and to use all honorable means to secure the passage of Senate bill 691, to confirm and declare legal the acts of certain officers of the United States.

And that the governor be requested to forward copies of this resolution to the presiding officer of each House of Congress and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress from Ohio.

A. D. MARSH,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOHN G. WARWICK,
President of the Senate.

Adopted February 14, 1884.

Mr. CONGER. The joint resolution will be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, the Chair supposes.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that it may be printed. There are allegations in that resolution of the Legislature of the State of Ohio which are entirely and absolutely incorrect. In point of fact they do not even come within the rule which some Western lawyers have adopted of saying that where there are three facts stated two of them are true.

I wish the resolution to be printed, so that I may hereafter call attention to the assertion made in it that those lands ever were restored to market. The truth is, that all the lands purchased, not only those within the lines of the railroad and the railroad lands, but all the lands that were purchased by persons desiring to purchase lands direct, entering lands, and all that were settled upon as homestead or pre-emption entries, were secured without any authority of law, the lands never having been offered in market as the prerequisite for any purchase whatever.

I make this statement that I may contradict the assertion of the resolution that the lands were regularly in the market and regularly purchased. The matter is before the Committee on Public Lands now, and the decision of the courts upon some of these points is that the lands never were legally in the market or entered for pre-emption in consequence of their never having been publicly offered for sale.

I move that the joint resolutions of the Legislature of Ohio be printed and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents a memorial and joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, in favor of the passage of an act providing for an equitable and just distribution of the annuities due the Sac and Fox Indians. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, as follows:

Memorial and joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled in regard to an investigation of the matters pertaining to the Fox Indians of Iowa.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

The General Assembly of the State of Iowa beg leave to state that prior to the year A. D. 1804 the Sac and Fox tribe of Indians of the Mississippi were the owners in common of large tracts of land, including great portions of what is now known as the State of Iowa.

That by virtue of certain treaties made by them with the United States in said year and in years subsequent thereto they ceded said lands to the United States, and the moneys arising from the sale thereof were invested by the General Government for the use and benefit of said Sac and Fox Indians, and that the fund so invested amounts annually to the sum of $54,000, as will more fully appear from the report of the honorable the Indian Commissioner for the year A. D. 1881.

That by virtue of certain treaties made by and between Sac and Fox Indians and the United States the said Indians were removed, located, and settled in the State of Kansas and afterward removed and settled in the Indian Territory, but before their removal to the last-named place, and as early as the year A. D. 1855, a majority of the Fox tribe not being satisfied with the country and their relations with the Sacs not being as pleasant as desirable, returned to Tama County, Iowa, where they have since resided, and with their own money have purchased large tracts of valuable lands, which are held in trust for them by the governor of the State of Iowa.

That by an apportionment made by Congress in the year A. D. 1860 the annuities due and coming to the Sac and Fox tribe of Indians it was ordered that the Indians in Iowa should receive the sum of $11,174.66, and the balance of said $54,000 was paid to the Indians in the Indian Territory.

That there are now in Iowa three hundred and sixty Indians, all of the Fox tribe, and of the same tribe there are twenty in the Indian Territory.

There are of the Sac tribe of Indians only four hundred and twenty, all in the Indian Territory.

That the Fox tribe of Indians in Iowa understand and believe that said apportionment was made under a misapprehension of the facts and under a belief that most of said joint tribes of Indians were in the Indian Territory.

That the said Fox tribe of Indians have asked the Indian Commissioner to adjust the matter equitably and pay them the amount justly due them as their proportion of said fund; but he informs them that under existing laws he is powerless and can do nothing while the law of 1860 is in force.

Wherefore the General Assembly of the State of Iowa hereby respectfully ask Congress to pass such laws in relation thereto as shall give to each tribe such portion of said annuities as shall be equitable and just, and we especially ask that the members thereof from this State may use their influence for the accomplishment of the same.

Resolved, That the secretary of state is directed to forward a copy of this memorial and joint resolution to the President of the United States Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, with the request that they be laid before both Houses composing the Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of W. H. Parsons & Co., of New York city, praying an investigation of the cause of delay in the delivery by the Senate post-office to the Joint Committee on Printing of their proposal for supplying the Government with paper for the coming year; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. DAWES. I present the petition of between thirteen and fourteen hundred persons who represent themselves to have been slaves in the Cherokee Nation up to the time of the treaty of 1866, by which treaty they were made freemen and were entitled to all the rights and privileges of citizens of the Indian Territory. They represent that an appropriation made last year by Congress of $300,000 on account of the land of the Cherokee Nation which was sold to the United States has been distributed by the Cherokee Nation among their own people to the exclusion of these freedmen in contravention of the treaty stipulation with the United States, and they desire an investigation by this Congress and redress, if it is in the power of Congress to control the disposition of that money.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON presented a petition of citizens of Walnut, Pottawattamie County, Iowa; a petition of citizens of Taylor County, Iowa; a petition of citizens of Hardin County, Iowa, and a petition of citizens of Centre Junction, Iowa, praying that an appropriation be made for educational purposes in Alaska; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of A. M. Devereux, late third lieutenant United States Revenue Marine, praying restoration to his former rank and full salary, with interest to date of such restoration; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Susan A. Shelby, of Washington, D. C., praying additional compensation for cotton taken during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the petition of James Madison Cutts, of the District of Columbia, late captain of the Eleventh Infantry, and brevet lieutenant-colonel United States Army, praying to be placed on the retired-list of the Army. There is a bill accompanying the petition, and as it comes from the petitioner and at his request, I presume it should be presented at this time to go with the petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can go with the petition as a paper but not as a bill, unless introduced by some Senator.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition with the accompanying paper will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONGER presented two petitions of citizens of New York, praying for certain amendments of the law in regard to American shipping; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VEST. I present the petition of Joseph M. Pilkington, praying for the reference of his claim for quartermaster and commissary stores taken during the war to the Court of Claims; and I shall introduce a bill for his relief when that order is reached. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I present the petition of Catherine D. Gale and Sarah H. Blake and W. L. Gale, granddaughters of John Devereux, of New Berne, N. C., praying the passage of such laws as may be necessary for the distribution to the proper parties of what is known as the French spoliation fund. I suppose this petition should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Claims has had charge of that matter latterly.

Mr. HARRIS. Then let it go to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CALL. I present the petition of J. W. Tucker and numerous other citizens of Hernando County, Florida. The petition represents that "for many years a large quantity of valuable land, situated in this and adjoining counties, has been withheld from sale and settlement to aid in building, as alleged, a railroad from Amelia Island to Tampa Bay. By act of Congress approved 17th May, 1856, certain lands were granted to the State of Florida to aid in the construction of said road. Near twenty-eight years have elapsed since the said railroad grant was made, and yet there is no railroad in that county. The petitioners therefore pray that the subject be investigated, and, should it appear that said lands have been forfeited by non-compliance with the condition of the grant, that the same be declared forfeited and subject to sale and entry as other public lands belonging to the United States." I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I present two petitions, signed by citizens of Kansas, formerly soldiers in the Union Army, praying for the passage of a bill equalizing bounties. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS presented a petition of citizens of Washington, D. C., praying that St. Luke's Protestant Episcopal church, in that city, be relieved from certain taxes; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to present, for the purpose of reference to the Committee on Public Lands, a series of resolutions of the common council of the city of Portland, Oreg., opposing the forfeiture of the land grant of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. The document is not addressed to Congress, and that is the reason why I ask unanimous consent to present it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the paper will be received and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Asahel D. Whitcomb, late private Company E, First Regiment Missouri Engineers and Mechanics, praying to be granted a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BOWEN presented a petition of citizens of Pueblo County, Colorado, praying to be relieved from the payment of certain judgments; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORGAN. I present a petition of numerous citizens of Huntsville, Ala., some of them public officers of the United States and others of the State, praying for an appropriation of money for a public building of the United States in the city of Huntsville. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. I present a petition of James D. McPheeters Post, No. 182, Grand Army of the Republic, of Fredericksburg, Washington County, Indiana, praying for the passage of the bill introduced by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], repealing the act fixing a limitation of time within which claims for arrears of pension may be made. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present resolutions adopted February 9, 1884, at a special meeting of Colonel Grover Post, No. 78, Department of Missouri, Grand Army of the Republic, held at Warrensburg, Mo., asking Congress for the passage of a bill granting pensions to those who served in the Indian and Mexican wars, and also for equalizing bounties to soldiers of the war of the rebellion and a grant of bounty lands to each of them for services rendered. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present also resolutions adopted by Admiral Farragut Post, No. 3, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Missouri, at Kansas City, January 26, 1884, memorializing Congress for the passage of a bill granting a pension to Mrs. Nina M. Gwynn, widow of the late Capt. Nat. M. Gwynn, at the rate of $40 per month. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. On the 7th of January of the present year I presented the petition of Mrs. Mary Hays, as the dependent mother of David J. Hays, late a sergeant in Company E, Sixth Regiment Iowa Volunteers, asking for arrears of pension because of an error that had been made in the prosecution of her claim, without any fault on her part. The petition was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and is now pending there. I present additional evidence to sustain her claim to the arrears, being the affidavits of the claimant herself and of her husband, James Hays, and of Ira W. Gilman; and I move that these papers, as additional evidence, be referred to the Committee on Pensions, to accompany the petition now pending before that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GROOME presented a memorial of 29 patentees and manufacturers, of Baltimore, Md., remonstrating against legislation adverse to the rights of patentees; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. SAWYER presented a petition of the common council of Oconto, Wis., and the board of supervisors of the county of Oconto, Wisconsin, praying for an appropriation to continue the improvement of the harbor at Oconto, on Green Bay, Wis.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB. I present certain papers, being a statement of facts, which I ask may be printed and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, to accompany Senate bill No. 934, for the relief of the officers and crew of the United States sloop-of-war Cumberland, which I offered on a previous day.

The papers were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 419) for the extension of letters patent to the heirs of Rudolph Leschot, deceased, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1518) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish certificates of discharge to certain members of the Missouri Home Guards, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1477) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at the Three Sisters, near Georgetown, D. C., reported it with amendments.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1319) for payment to Thomas McMahon for labor and services rendered under Peter McNamara, a contractor for the board of public works, District of Columbia, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ageed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1254) referring the claim of Apollos Hale, administrator, to the Court of Claims, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report back favorably and without amendment the bill (S. 1040) to provide for the construction of a public building at New Albany, Ind.

Mr. VOORHEES. I venture to ask unanimous consent to put that bill on its passage. The people of New Albany have long suffered for want of this building. There is a term of court there; and it would facilitate the enactment of the bill into a law for it to pass the Senate now and go to the House of Representatives. I venture to ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator hope to get the bill passed in time to hold the court in the building during the present term?

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope by passing it this morning, I will say to my friend from Alabama, to more certainly get it through the other House at the present session, which is important. For that reason I ask action now. I know the Senator from Alabama does not intend to object.

Mr. MORGAN. I am sorry to say that I must disappoint my friend from Indiana, for I do object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. VOORHEES. Do I understand the Senator to object?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama objects.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 857) providing that sales of property on the order or decree of the circuit or district courts be made by the marshal, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 4) to provide for the settlement of accounts with the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

JOURNAL OF RECONSTRUCTION COMMITTEE.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 54) to authorize the printing of the journal of the joint committee of Congress of December, 1865, have instructed me to report the same back with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed, and to offer as a substitute a resolution of the Senate, as the amount of printing comes much within the limit of $500.

The joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island, from the Committee on Printing, reports an original Senate resolution, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That 6,000 copies of the journal of the joint committee of fifteen appointed in December, 1865, of which William Pitt Fessenden was chairman on the part of the Senate and Thaddeus Stevens on the part of the House, authorized "to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called Confederate States of America, and report whether they or any of them are entitled to be represented in either House of Congress, with leave to report at any time, by bill or otherwise," be printed; 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution just reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BECK. I desire the chairman of the committee to tell us what use there is in printing that journal without printing all the records of every one of the committees.

Mr. ANTHONY. The use is its historical interest.

Mr. BECK. I happened to serve on one or two of those committees in the other House with Mr. Stevens, and there were all sorts of journals. I can not see anything in it except that a few gentlemen were there and made motions. I should like to hear an explanation from the Senator from Rhode Island as to the necessity for publishing this journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BECK. No, I do not raise any objection to its consideration.

Mr. VEST. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the resolution goes over. It will be laid before the Senate to-morrow under the practice of the Chair.

PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANIES—SINKING FUND.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Read against the United States for the alleged use of projectiles claimed as the invention of said Read, and by him alleged to have been used pursuant to a contract or arrangement made between him and the War Department, and for which no compensation has been made; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 68) declaring the lawfulness of the occupation of the country drained by the Congo River and its tributaries by the African International Association to the extent of its actual occupation and for the purposes avowed by said association and to recognize its flag, and to appropriate money to carry this resolution into effect; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. That the Government of the United States recognizes the existence of the following facts with reference to the occupation of the stations and other places now in the peaceful occupancy of the African International Association within the country in Africa that is drained by the Congo River, its tributaries, and adjacent rivers:

First. That in view of the laws of nations such occupancy and the powers and privileges which said African International Association now has in that country are lawful, the same being derived through treaties and agreements from the local governments of the native tribes and kingdoms which have always ruled in that country.

Second. That such lawful occupancy extends to all portions of the country drained by the Congo River and its tributaries from the mouth of said river to its sources, wherever it has been established by treaty or agreement between the proper, native, local governments and the proper agents of the said African International Association, and is in fact occupied with the consent of such local governments.

Third. That the rights, privileges, and authority thus acquired in said country so occupied by the African International Association entitle its flag, as the symbol thereof, to the recognition and respect of other countries as the flag of The Free States of Congo.

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States is requested to invite the concurrence of the other powers in these declarations and to a further agreement based thereon, to include in substance the following:

1. That the navigation of the Congo River and its tributaries shall remain open and free to the equal enjoyment of all nations for the purpose of lawful commerce.

2. That the free right of ingress to and egress from the Congo country overland for the purposes of lawful commerce and travel shall be equally enjoyed by the people of all countries.

3. That the deportation of African people as slaves or as apprentices, or as laborers or servants, held under any agreement or pretext to serve as such in any other country, shall be prohibited and prevented as to the people of the Congo country in such manner as the treaty powers shall agree upon.

SEC. 3. That the sum of —— dollars is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be added to the contingent fund of the Department of State, and to be immediately available, to be employed under the direction of the Secretary of State in carrying these resolutions into effect.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 69) to print certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Thomas Allen; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

SOUTHERN CYCLONE SUFFERERS.

Mr. RANSOM introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 65) for the relief of sufferers by the storm of February 19, 1884, in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama, and appropriating $100,000 therefor; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. RANSOM. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War for the relief of such destitute persons as may require assistance in the districts in North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama visited by the storms on the night of February 19, and that the Secretary of War is authorized and empowered in his discretion to use all such means and measures for the relief of said sufferers as he is authorized and empowered to use by joint resolutions approved February 12, 1884, and February 15, 1884, in behalf of the sufferers by the flood of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers.

Mr. RANSOM. I ask that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, but before the reference is made I desire to say a few words to the Senate.

I have felt it to be my duty to present to the Senate this joint resolution. The newspapers of the country bring so many facts daily to our eyes that events sometimes the most startling do not attract the public notice; and that is my reason for the very few words that I shall now address to the Senate.

In my experience and in my reading I recall no calamity in the history of this country from its discovery to this hour so unexpected, so sudden, so awful, and so destructive of life and property as the storm which last week visited a district of country extending through the four States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama.

I can not and I shall not attempt to draw that heartrending picture before the Senate. On last Tuesday night the people along the track of that storm went to their beds in quiet confidence and promise of a peaceful night and a happy morning. About 1 o'clock at night a storm without precedent in this or any other country at any time passed over that people. The Senate and the country can scarcely realize the fact that over five hundred people were killed that night by the tempest, that thousands of people were wounded, and there is now a track of waste and ruin and sorrow for hundreds of miles, with scarcely a habitation standing and with barely a family unstricken by the storm.

As generally happens in great general misfortunes, the most touching thing connected with this calamity is that it has fallen most severely upon the lowly and the feeble, and there are now in that afflicted district thousands of people without a shelter, without clothing, without food.

The private charity of this country, so active, so universal, so beautiful, and so beneficent, can not in time relieve these suffering people. Hence I have thought it right to invoke the beneficence of the Government.

With these few suggestions I ask that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and I will presume to request that committee to report upon it as soon as possible.

Mr. BROWN. Before that motion is put I desire to add only a word to the remarks which have been so well and so appropriately made by the Senator from North Carolina.

There have on former occasions cyclones and tempests passed over the territory of the States referred to that have been very destructive, but there has been no instance of like destruction in the case of any former cyclone known in the history of the country. There are places, contrary to the usual rule, if there be one, as to the track of cyclones, which are apt to be only a quarter or half a mile wide, where this is three miles wide; the timber swept to the ground; houses blown down; large numbers of people killed outright and much larger numbers very seriously injured, many of whom are dying and will yet die from their wounds.

In my own State the storm divided, if I may be allowed the expression, near the Alabama line. One portion of it took a direction across and through the center of the State toward the South Carolina line; the other passed through what we call Northern Georgia, and the destruction was simply terrific.

Private letters which I receive from home state that there never has been anything of distress like it. In the upper section of the State especially the people are usually poor, and are left entirely homeless, absolutely without anything except their lands; their stock killed, their houses blown down, and they are now upon the charity of their neighbors outside the line of the cyclone. There are numerous instances of this character.

I do think it is a case where some relief from the Congress of the United States would not only be appropriate but would be eminently proper. We have not hesitated to vote, and I think we have done right in voting, liberal appropriations in the case of the great freshets upon the Mississippi River and the Ohio River for the relief of the people. There was occasional destruction of life there and large destruction of property. As the rivers rose slowly, there was a chance usually for escape by the inhabitants; while they could not save their property, except such as was movable, they might save their lives. But in this instance the whole destruction was the work of but a moment or two. The cyclone passed rapidly over, spreading death and destruction in its path. There was no escape from it. People were caught as it found them and destroyed almost instantly, without any possibility of relief or escape.

I trust the Senate will feel it its duty under these circumstances to afford relief to that storm-stricken region as it has afforded relief to the flooded region in the West.

I most cordially second the resolution of the Senator from North Carolina. I am glad he introduced it, and trust the Senate will at an early hour favorably entertain it.

Mr. PUGH. The same destruction of life and property that has been so graphically and eloquently described by the Senators from North Carolina and Georgia was left in the track of the cyclone across the State of Alabama. It is unnecessary for me to say anything more than has been so well said by those Senators showing the merits of this appropriation. Certainly if there was any right to make an appropriation for the relief of the flood sufferers in the West, that claim is equally well founded as to this appropriation.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, either by the same cyclone or by one that immediately preceded or succeeded it, I am not sure, one of the cities of the State that I have the honor in part to represent on this floor suffered very seriously in the same way with the various localities referred to by other Senators suffered. I have not been requested by that people to ask the Congress of the United States to appropriate anything for the relief of the sufferers there. I am glad that I have not, because if I had been so requested, with my view of the constitutional powers of Congress to take money out of the Treasury for any such purpose I could not have complied with their request.

I simply desire now to say, ungracious as it may seem, that while my sympathies go out as readily to those who have suffered by calamities such as have been described, while I would be as ready as an individual as any other to the extent of my little means to aid those sufferers, I can not and will not at any time cast my vote in favor of taking one dollar out of the Treasury for any such purpose, because I believe that I have no constitutional power to do so.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I have not been informed of any request on the part of the people of Alabama for relief in respect of the disastrous visitation of that cyclone which has been referred to, and I shall hold my judgment in reserve about this matter until there is some application of that sort on the part of the people I represent. I expect we shall also hear by the time we get to the end of the history of this disastrous visitation that ships at sea have been struck by it also, and perhaps we shall be compelled to extend our benevolence so as to take those into account.

The new line on which we are setting out, this being I believe the first instance of the kind, is one that is dangerous in itself and deserves very mature consideration. I sympathize with the Senator from Tennessee in that sort of respect and regard for the legislative domain of the Congress of the United States which seeks to shut out from it any subject that is not clearly within our jurisdiction and power. I am not prepared now to say that I believe this question is within our jurisdiction.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator from Alabama state to the Senate whether he draws a distinction on the constitutional question between appropriations made for the relief of sufferers from floods in the West and sufferers from hurricane in the South?

Mr. MORGAN. I did not get up for the purpose of discussing the measure, and therefore I am not prepared now to state all the distinctions that I might be able to invent or discover between the two propositions. It is enough for me to know, at present at least, that I have not been appealed to by the people of Alabama, as far as I am advised through the newspapers or by private correspondence, for the bestowal of public charity from the Treasury of the United States upon our people. That is the question that I hold in reserve.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, I did not suppose the resolution would be debated at this time but that after some explanation by the honorable Senator who introduced it, which he has most happily made, it would be referred to the proper committee for consideration. But as some Senators have briefly given their views as to the power of Congress to make such an appropriation, I wish to say I do not doubt the existence of such a power, and I think when the question comes for full consideration it can be shown Congress has such authority. Congress provides for locust-stricken sections, for books and documents to be sent out to the people and seeds from the proper Department, for suffering people in the overflowed districts by which many of my own constituents have been relieved, for the nation to exhibit herself at the Centennial, and for the Yorktown celebration, and for a good many other similar performances and enterprises that stand upon no broader or deeper foundation than this. And there are many more of this sort, acts of mere beneficence to the people, from a very early history of the Government that would uphold and justify this. But I will not go into them now. It is enough for the present to say, as the Senator from Georgia has suggested, we can relieve the storm-stricken as well as the flood-stricken, and I unite in the hope the committee will give early and favorable consideration of the resolution.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, a large portion of the State of Indiana has been visited by a disastrous flood and the people there have called my attention to the very matter now before the Senate. There are a great many people who are houseless, who have no shelter. Under the recent appropriation the Secretary of War has conceived it his duty to send relief in the form of consignments of food, clothing, &c. I think his construction is correct so far as legislation has yet proceeded. But there is a very great principle involved in this matter. If the General Government enters upon giving relief to suffering people who have been visited by flood or storm, I can easily understand how relief in the way of shelter would be as important, perhaps more important, than even the supply of food. When a storm occurs in the winter season by which aged, infirm, and sick people are left houseless, their case should call, it seems to me, as loudly for relief from the Government by supplying them with shelter as where when a flood has swept away all they had in the way of provisions they should be supplied with rations.

It is not my purpose to discuss this point at this time, and my only object in rising was to say a word in behalf of those people who are deeply interested in my own State, to invoke an early consideration and a decision on this point whether the Government will go to the extent asked for by the Senator from North Carolina. Suspense in a matter of this kind is injurious. If these people, so far as shelter and temporary homes are concerned, are to rely on themselves and on voluntary aid and neighborhood charity, the sooner they are advised of that fact the better. If on the other hand aid is to be extended to them by the Government, the sooner that is known the better it will be for them. I hope the matter will have an earnest, practical solution at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. RANSOM. The Senate will pardon me for one word further. No Senator, no man, can respect the conscientious convictions of constitutional duty of my friend from Tennessee more than I do, and I hope I may be permitted to say that it gives me very great pleasure to know that no appeals have yet come from Tennessee or reached the ears of my friend from Alabama for the relief of the people in their respective States. I was rejoiced greatly to learn that the people of either of those States have not suffered so deeply or are so far relieved from want that this assistance will not be necessary for them. It is due to the people whom I, with my colleague, represent on this floor to say that no appeal has come to me from them to ask the Congress of the United States for succor to their distressed fellow-citizens; but I have not waited for a formal appeal. I shall wait for no such appeal. When I saw from the public prints of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama, and those reports reflected in every newspaper in the country, that five hundred people had been killed in one night, that hundreds of families, thousands of women and children, poor, helpless, shivering, and suffering, were left without a shelter for the day or night, and left without food for an hour, many of them stripped of the last piece of clothing that they had, their houses scattered by the winds for miles, every vestige of property that they had lost, their children suffering for bread, their neighbors unable to help them, private charity not equal to its great desire to do its duty, I am glad, sir, that I did not wait for any petition to come to me from that people to remind me of my duty. And I think the Senate will sympathize with me in that regard.

I have simply to ask that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. KENNA submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1597) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. GROOME submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 341) to regulate the rank of engineer officers in the United States Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. PLATT. In behalf of the Committee on Territories I ask leave to have printed some facts and statistics which have been submitted to the committee by Hon. THOMAS H. BRENTS, of Washington Territory, bearing upon the question of the admission of Washington Territory as a State. I move that two hundred copies be printed for the use of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut, from the Committee on Territories, moves that a paper, which he now presents from that committee, touching a matter pending before the committee, be printed for the use of the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MCPHERSON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of the loss of the ship Joseph W. Mickerson, on the coast of Africa, in the year 1876, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims. Said papers refer to bill for the relief of Joseph W. Yates, now before said committee.

ARREDONDO GRANT IN FLORIDA.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with copies of the papers in his office in relation to the Arredondo grant, in Columbia County, Florida, relating to the origin and history of the said grant and its survey and location on land in Columbia County, Florida; and the decision of the United States circuit court for the northern district of Florida in relation thereto; and of the claim of the State of Florida to the lands claimed under said grant and the selection of the same under any of the several acts granting public lands to the State of Florida; and of the issue of land-scrip under the decision of the circuit court of the United States to the claimants under said grant; and of the location of said scrip on land occupied and in possession by actual settlers and others claiming under the State of Florida.

Mr. CALL. I desire to make a statement, which I have in my hand, from a very respectable and responsible lawyer, Mr. Washington M. Ives, of Lake City, Fla., and also from Mr. A. G. Bigelow and other citizens of that State:

I write you about what concerns over 4,000 citizens of this county. By a recent floating of the Arredondo grant many tracts of land are declared vacant upon the books at the United States land office in Gainesville. This land was purchased by parties since 1854, at which time and since which time the Government declined to patent any of the land embraced in the grant. Under the purchase conveyances have been made for many years, and in some cases twenty families live upon the quarter of a section. Under the homestead and pre-emption laws the rightful possessors can not procure titles. Unless the Commissioner of the General Land Office can make some ruling in reference to the matter great wrong will be done; in fact, some has already been done. The notice of the float is very recent, and already good fields for years in cultivation have been homesteaded.

I urge you to do what you can for the relief of these honest people who are losing their houses and possessions by the matter. Anything that can be done should be done quickly.

I ask for the passage of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with information as to the suit of the heirs of Arredondo against the United States in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Florida, relating to land in Columbia County, Florida, and of the proceedings in said cause, and the time when the same was commenced, and as to the claimants or heirs in said cause and the evidence therein, and all other material facts relating to the same and the validity and justice of said claim.

ADDITIONAL STEEL VESSELS.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 300 copies of the report on Senate bill 698, the usual number having been exhausted.

PRINTING OF COMMITTEE DOCUMENTS.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That when a joint committee, or a committee of either House, shall have leave to print its report, or the testimony taken by it, or any other document for the use of the committee, the number printed shall be limited to 100 copies, unless the House to which the committee belongs shall order otherwise.

LEASES OF LANDS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer a resolution, and ask that it be printed and lie over until to-morrow, when I shall call it up for action.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas, in compliance with Senate resolution of December 4, 1883, the honorable Secretary of the Interior has transmitted copies of documents and correspondence relating to leases of lands in the Indian Territory to citizens of the United States for cattle-grazing and other purposes; and

Whereas it appears from Executive Document No. 54 of the present session of Congress, containing said copies of correspondence, &c., that several million of acres of land in the Indian Territory have been leased to citizens of the United States for cattle-grazing purposes: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, instructed to investigate the matter of said leases; whether the same have been made in conformity to law; whether any money paid by any of the lessees under the terms of said leases have been covered into the Treasury; whether any of said lessees have attempted to survey any of the lands in said Indian Territory belonging, secured, or granted by treaty with the United States to any Indian tribe, or has designated any of the boundaries of said lands by marking trees or otherwise; and that said committee be instructed to report by bill or otherwise at any time.

Mr. PLATT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over under the objection of the Senator from Connecticut and will be laid before the Senate to-morrow.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. PENDLETON. There is a vacancy upon the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River, made by the declension and excusal of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON]. I move that the Chair have authority to fill the vacancy.

The motion was agreed to, by unanimous consent; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. GEORGE to fill the vacancy.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 58) filling an existing vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 168) for the payment of certain expenses out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 1482) making all public roads and highways post-routes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President this day approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. 51) authorizing an expenditure of money for Indian educational purposes.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1155.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GEORGE addressed the Senate. Having spoken till 2 o'clock,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). The Senator from Mississippi will suspend for a moment. The Chair calls attention to the fact that the bill (S. 698) to authorize the construction of additional steel vessels for the Navy was made the special order for to-day at 2 o'clock. It can not under the rules interfere with the unfinished business, but will under the rules go to the head of the calendar of special orders, to come up on the completion of the present bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the question of finance at this time is too important to be treated of as it is by the bill before us. The Senators on the Finance Committee, who are supposed to know more about this subject than any other gentlemen in the Senate, widely differ upon the bill. I do not hope to be able to add any material contribution to the discussion on this subject; but as I shall be in a very small minority in the vote on the final passage of the bill, I claim the indulgence of the Senate to state the reasons which induce me to vote against what seems to be the will of a large majority of this body.

In the first place, for a permanent and ever-increasing evil we have what is acknowledged by its friends to be only a temporary remedy, a mere makeshift to tide us over the troubles of to-day. For that reason I think it ought not to be adopted.

In the next place, the friends of the measure, some of them the most distinguished for their knowledge of finance, members of the Finance Committee, discredit the measure by declaring that it will be inefficient. With this admission I shall be relieved from the duty of discussing at any great length that aspect of the question, as I may well rely on the authority of these distinguished Senators conceding in this debate that if we pass this bill it will furnish no efficient remedy against the evil of a contraction of our currency. To prove this I shall read a sentence or two from the speech delivered on this subject by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who has probably as great a reputation for a knowledge of the finances of this country as any member of this body. He says, respecting the bill introduced by the Senator from New Jersey:

If we can agree on no other I shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from New Jersey, but with grave doubts of its working. It does not furnish the remedy for the disease.

That is the opinion of the Senator from Ohio condemning this measure. An equally distinguished Senator, the chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. MORRILL], who has given probably as much thought and study to the question of finance as any man in the Union, is equally explicit in declaring his opinion and his judgment that this measure will not meet the evil which it is intended to remedy. That Senator said in the speech he made on the subject a few days ago:

I wish to say in advance that so far as the bill is concerned it is really inadequate to give any permanent relief.

* * * * * * *

The business of the country has shown in the last week that our measure is insufficient, or that while the proposition has been pending here of allowing 10 per cent. addition to the amount of circulation upon the bonds deposited by the national banks, at the end of one week over $2,000,000 of circulation was surrendered to the Treasury by the national banks.

Again, the same Senator says:

If there is to be anything done, something more than this bill is absolutely necessary.

According to this the failure of the bill has already occurred, for the banks, notwithstanding its certain and assured passage by this body, even while we are discussing it, are surrendering their notes at the rate of $2,000,000 per week.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], also an able and distinguished member of the Committee on Finance, though I understand him to favor the bill, yet voted in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], which proposed to very materially change it by allowing the issue of bank notes for a considerable amount above the par value of the United States bonds deposited as security for their redemption. And the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], equally distinguished for his knowledge of finance, not only believes the bill will be worthless to prevent contraction of the currency, but that it will increase and intensify that evil. He says:

I think it will not—

That is, guard against the dangers of contraction—

I think it will not, and that the ultimate effect of it will be to accelerate and intensify the evil results which it is intended to obviate.

The author of the bill himself, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], though insisting that it is a good remedy for the evils of contraction, yet felt bound to say that it probably would be necessary, in order to make it efficient, to repeal the tax on circulation, expressing also his conviction that if the bill passed the tax would be repealed.

So, Mr. President, this measure comes before us discredited and dishonored by the judgment of its friends, by the opinion and judgment of the most distinguished and able members of the Finance Committee, and even discredited by the judgment and opinion of its author himself. Under these circumstances I think we ought to pause before we, in the presence of the great evils of contraction now so seriously threatened, offer the country this measure as an efficient remedy. I think that the committee committed a grave error in not considering other and obvious measures of relief, and confining themselves alone to an effort to conciliate the banks and induce them to reduce the contraction now going on through their agency. The proposition offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], and substantially also offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], whose amendment is now the pending question, would in my opinion and in the opinion of many who have studied this question afford a safer and more certain relief against the threatened evil of contraction.

It is urged, though, that we ought not to resort to the issue of more Treasury notes, as proposed in the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], because that would be banking by the Government. Mr. President, that is a misuse of terms. Although the issue of paper money is an annex to, and sometimes a part of, banking, it is not an essential part of that business. Banking for all legitimate purposes may be carried on and is carried on in every civilized country of the globe by institutions, by banks, which have not the power to issue paper money. In our own country we have over 3,400 State banks performing all the essential business and duties of banking without the power to issue paper money, or if they have, the power is suppressed by a tax of 10 per cent. on their circulation. Then we have several hundred private bankers who also perform all the functions of banking without the power of issuing circulating notes. Then there are some six or eight hundred savings-banks doing the same thing without the power to issue notes to circulate as money.

So, Mr. President, I think when it is said that the issue of Treasury notes is banking by the Government, this statement is a fallacy, and instead of furnishing a real argument against the amendment now under consideration it is an effort to kill it by giving it a bad name. Suppose that we should direct that the division of the Treasury Department which issues Treasury notes should be removed from the Treasury building and should occupy a place on one of the business streets of this city, and that we were to require the superintendent or manager to put as a sign over the door of this business house "United States Government Bank;" and then suppose that a stranger unacquainted with our laws should come along and go into that institution and say, "I have some money; I want to make a deposit." He would be informed at once, "We do not receive any deposits here." Suppose then he should say, "I have some exchange on a foreign city; I should like to sell it." He would be informed, "We do not buy exchange." Suppose, again, he were to say, "I want to buy exchange upon some other place." He would be answered, "We do not sell exchange here." After all this the stranger, in his anxiety to learn the nature and character of this singular institution, remembering the sign upon the door and believing still that a bank was kept there, would probably say, "I have a friend who wants to borrow some money; can he get it?" He would be informed, "We do not loan money here." The next question he would perhaps ask, after all this experience, would be this: "Well, if you are a bank, if you do not deal in exchange, and if you do not loan money, what in the world do you do; what function of banking do you perform?" "Why," the answer would be, "We issue money." "What do you do with it after you issue it?" "We simply use it in the payment of our ordinary expenses and in the payment of our debts;" and that is all there is in this idea of Government banking. The issue of these notes is but the exercise of a power which the Government has always exerted to issue an obligation which represents its indebtedness to the holder. If we issue bonds it is not said that is banking; but if we issue a note in the shape and form of a bank note, payable to bearer, so that it may circulate easily from one hand to another, which is nothing more than an obligation of the Government to pay the amount of money specified in it, and without interest, then it is said to be banking. But if we issue a bond, bearing interest, for the same purpose, that is not banking. I think there is nothing in that argument. We are not banking now; yet we are issuing notes of this kind daily from the Treasury; not, it is true, new Treasury notes, except in place of old ones worn out or mutilated, but as Treasury notes come in they are paid out again; and yet nobody supposes that the Government is engaged in banking. Nobody suspects that during the early period of the history of the law which authorized the issuance of Treasury notes the Government was banking. It performs none of the essential parts of banking, not one. In the issue of Treasury notes it comes nearer performing that part of the admitted power of Congress to coin money and regulate its value.

But it is said next that it would be a dangerous power to allow the Government to issue paper money—danger of inflation, danger of issuing too much and adding unduly to the body of the currency. There is no power which we possess which can not, if unwisely and improperly used, be a source of danger to the country. There is the conceded power to declare war. If we declare it unnecessarily that is the greatest of dangers, and yet we have the clear power of doing it. So with every other power which we possess, we having the discretion to use it as we will. If we exercise it recklessly, if we use it unwisely, if we exert it with passion, there is danger to the country. But is there any more reason why this power to issue notes to circulate as money on the part of the Government would be dangerously and unwisely used than any other power? The history of the issue of these notes up to this time does not show it. On the contrary, this history shows that the Congress has been more disposed to be conservative unduly, to contract the currency than to expand it.

But it is said that the regulation of the volume of currency should be left to the business needs and wants of the country. That, sir, is a fine phrase; but will Senators tell me how the mere business of the country can regulate the volume of the currency? To regulate the volume of the currency by the needs and demands of business is a good rule by which the authority, governmental or banking, which has the power to regulate it shall go by, but of itself business can not perform the act of regulation. This must be done by a power outside of mere business; it must be done either by the Government or the banks; and while, as I said, the regulating of the volume of currency by the business needs and wants of the country is a safe and sound rule to go by, it is a rule which must be put in operation by some authority or power capable of action on it. And the question now before us is whether it is safer to leave this power in the Government or to vest it in banks. I do not believe it is a safe power in the banks. I believe it is a great power, which is capable of being used for the destruction of the business and interests of the people. If confided to the banks, as is conceded by the friends of this bill, the banks will issue their notes or regulate the volume of the currency according to their own interest, and that is not an observance of the rule that it shall be regulated by the business wants of the country. If it be their interest to contract—not the interest of the business of the country, but if it be the interest of the banks to contract—they will contract. If it be their interest to expand the currency, they will expand it, and the business of the country may take care of itself.

I have a table here, which I have prepared from official sources, which shows that, except when there were political considerations to influence the action of the banks, some ultimate end to be attained by them by influencing the legislation of Congress, they have uniformly expanded the currency, and that when they had an ultimate aim to attain, some end to be gained from Congress by legislation, they have, without regard to their direct and immediate interest or the interests of the country, contracted. From the beginning of 1865 up to and including the year 1875 there was a continuous year-by-year increase in the currency of the national banks, and in 1875 their net earnings were 9.82 per cent. higher than they have been since, and yet we saw that in 1876, with no assignable cause as far as I know, unless it was to influence the Presidential election then pending, there was a sudden contraction of $22,000,000. We find also that this contraction was followed by a large decrease in the net earnings of the banks, a fall from 9.82 per cent. to 6.82. Why this loss was submitted to is unexplainable on business principles. It must have resulted, as a similar contraction in 1881 did, from political considerations, the effort to defeat Mr. Tilden, which, though unsuccessful in preventing his election, was yet quite sufficient to prevent his inauguration. In the next year, 1877, after the inauguration of Mr. Hayes, it was a desirable political end to reverse the Democratic majority in the House of Representatives, and we find that there was another contraction of $15,000,000. This also was attended by a loss in the net earnings of the banks, as compared with 1875, of 3.63 per cent. So we find, sir, that while the banks as a general rule regulate the volume of the currency according to their own interest and not by the business interest of the country, yet they are quite capable of sacrificing both to the exigency of political considerations.

It is not disputed that the contraction of the national-bank currency in 1881 was made to attain a political end, the defeat of what they regarded as unfriendly legislation, by a veto of the President. And again it was successful, and again it was accompanied by a sacrifice of their interests and of the interests of the country.

The statistics show that uniformly the net earnings of the banks are decreased by contraction and increased by expansion, so when there is contraction there is some motive involved in it disconnected from business interests. After the contraction of $15,000,000 in 1877, followed by the loss of 3.63 per cent. on net earnings, there was an increase in circulation in 1878 of seven and a half millions, and the result was, that the tendency to loss produced by the contraction of $37,000,000 in the two preceding years was reduced to the insignificant sum of .14 of 1 per cent. Next year, 1879, there was an increase of $5,000,000 in the currency; in 1880 another increase of $15,000,000; in 1881 another increase of $11,000,000; in 1882 a still further increase of $2,000,000; and in each of these years there was a steady increase of net earnings by the banks, the total increase in 1882 being 3.12 per cent. But in 1883 when we were approaching the period when we were to take action on this subject, we find that rule of increase, followed by the banks since 1877, was reversed, and contraction took place to the amount of $9,000,000, being followed also by a loss to the banks in net earnings.

It is thus made manifest that the regulation of the volume of the currency is in accordance with the sole interest of the banks, direct and immediate or remote, as affected by political considerations, and not in accordance with the business needs of the country. It is also seen that expansion is always to the direct interests of the banks and contraction always against it.

There would be no danger now of the contraction which the bill seeks to counteract if we could rely on the regulation by the banks of the volume of the currency by the business wants of the country, or even by their own direct and immediate interests.

If it be true that expansion means profit and contraction means loss, and if it also be true that we can assign with certainty at one or two points contraction to the efforts on the part of the banks to control the legislation of Congress, it seems to me that I have made out my case, that it is unsafe to allow them to control the volume of our currency. What was the necessity for the reduction of $9,000,000 this past year? The taxes had nearly all been taken off; they had made fine profits in 1882, and what was the reason of the reduction in the circulation or contraction of $9,000,000 at this particular time?

Mr. BAYARD. The bonds were called in.

Mr. GEORGE. The 3 percents were not all the bonds in this country. There were $1,300,000,000 of bonds, as I understand, outstanding.

Mr. BAYARD. The bonds they held were called in.

Mr. GEORGE. When they got the money for the bonds they held, and which had been called in, they could invest it in bonds that they did not before hold. So it appears I have shown by these statistics that the banks contract when they have a political end to gain without reference to their interest. They lost last year by the contraction, they lost in their net earnings although their capital was not diminished; and for what purpose did they lose? Congress needs to have an argument to influence us and show that unless we grant them more favors, give them more extra privileges, more advantages, contraction would still go on to a still more disastrous extent.

But, Mr. President, I am sorry to say that although they should not possess the power to issue paper money, although that should be retained by the Government in its own hands exclusively, there remains in the nature of things, in the nature of the business of banking, a dangerous power in the banks to contract or expand the currency at their will. Contraction does not mean merely destruction of the currency, the return of the national-bank notes to the Treasury and the taking of them out of circulation. This is not the only or even the ordinary means of contraction by the banks when they see proper to contract. Locking up currency in their vaults, refusing to meet the business demands of the community, is as much contraction as if the money was absolutely destroyed.

But I object, Mr. President, that the Finance Committee in reporting this measure—conceded by a considerable number of them to be inefficient—have omitted obvious and plain remedies for the existing situation. There is the Vest amendment now under consideration by the Senate, that would furnish a complete remedy, and it is not amenable to the objection urged that under it the Government might unduly expand the currency of the country; because by its terms the Treasury notes are limited dollar for dollar to the exact amount of national-bank notes that shall be retired. There is no expansion in that; it is but the substitution of Treasury notes to supply the want created by the retirement of national-bank notes. This amendment I regard as a necessary means of emancipating Congress and the country from the domination of the banks. If it were the law now, we would not be trembling before the awful majesty and power of the national banks, eager and anxious to conciliate them, because we distrust our ability to throw off their galling yoke. Enact it now, and the country and all the business interests in it may well rest secure in the conviction that they are safe from the antagonizing interests and the caprices of the banks. So plain is this to me, that I wonder why the amendment is not immediately adopted.

Again, Mr. President, if the amendment of the Senator from Missouri were adopted it would in itself tend to prevent contraction on the part of the national banks. If they undertook contraction from any motive except a business motive, if they had an idea that they could influence the legislation of Congress or the political contests of the day by contraction, they would see at once that they could not accomplish their purpose, because every dollar they returned would be supplied at once by Treasury notes issued in the place of it.

A very singular argument was urged against this amendment, or the Plumb amendment (which is substantially the same thing), by the friends of the present bill during the last week. The argument came in the way of a question as to what the friends of these amendments (Mr. PLUMB and Mr. VEST) would do if a supposed case should happen like this: "Suppose," they said, "the national banks should suddenly return $300,000,000 of their notes into the Treasury, and thereupon the Treasury, as required by these amendments, should replace them with Treasury notes, and after that the banks were to reverse their action and suddenly issue $300,000,000 of their notes, thus causing by that amount a disastrous expansion of the currency?"

I take it for granted that honorable Senators in arguing a question of this gravity and importance would not indulge in suppositions that were entirely impossible, pure chimeras. I assume that they would not undertake to affright us from our duty and propriety by conjuring up impossible actions on the part of the banks, and thereby foreshadowing a state of facts which would materially injure if it did not ruin the business of the country. It is clear that they meant that it was within the range of probability that the banks might do what they supposed they would do; that is, contract suddenly $300,000,000. Now, if they may and probably would do that, it is the strongest possible argument against giving them the power to issue notes.

And then, again, the supposition goes to this extent: that after the business needs of the country had been supplied by the issue of $300,000,000 Treasury notes to prevent the loss occasioned by the withdrawal of $300,000,000 bank notes the banks would seek to flood the country with paper money by expanding the currency unduly to the extent of $300,000,000. If that be so, if that is a possibility under the present system, it is the strongest argument in the world why we should have another system. We ought not to leave the business interests of this country, the fortunes and the destinies of this people, to the caprice or passion of bankers or of other men who are capable of doing the things which this supposition of the friends of this bill admits they might do.

It was asked what would we do in a case of that sort when the three hundred additional million dollars had been issued by the banks unnecessarily. My answer would be at once when such an attempt was made to destroy the business of the country, to repeal the bank charters and to take away from them the dangerous power to expand or contract the currency at their will.

But, Mr. President, there were other obvious means by which contraction could be successfully met. We have of one and two dollar notes of the legal-tender Treasury notes $57,941,461. We have of silver in the Treasury idle the sum of $62,000,000. If these ones and twos which enter into competition with silver for change and in the small business of the country were withdrawn from circulation and the amount of them reissued in larger bills, that would give a place and create a demand for a similar amount of change, and in this way we should get rid of the surplus silver now in the Treasury, either by putting out the silver or issuing small denominations of silver certificates, and thus meet contraction to the amount of about $60,000,000.

We have also $73,000,000 of legal-tender greenbacks and nine and a half million dollars of national-bank notes of the denomination of $5. Being a large silver-producing country (our product last year was $46,800,000), it is our obvious duty to furnish channels in which the money coined from this metal shall float. In order to do that we must give silver the monopoly of furnishing the change and filling the channels of the small business of this country. Suppose we do that, suppose we take away the ones and twos and fives, there will be over $200,000,000 of small money withdrawn from circulation and put into larger bills, and that will create a hiatus, a demand, and an absolute necessity for the issuance of either coin or small silver certificates to supply their place. The small business of the country is of immense importance. It concerns every person in it to a large extent; but as to four-fifths of our people it is the only business they are engaged or concerned in.

Now, as I said before, it is an obvious means of preventing contraction to give silver or silver certificates, either or both, at the choice of the people, the monopoly of all the currency under the denomination of $10. I do not know how much it would take to fill the channels of the small business of this country. The small business, bear in mind, is that which is done with coin or paper. It is a cash matter in the main. It is not like the large business of commerce, which is largely done through bills of exchange, certified checks, and clearing-houses. The dairyman, the truck man, the farmer, the day laborer, or the monthly laborer, the retail dealer, can not live and transact his business without small money. That is shown by the amount of small money that we have in circulation. This I can show only approximately.

The coinage of small coins up to 30th June, 1883, from the commencement, is as follows:

Half-eagles (fives)	149,565,980
Threes	1,565,592
Quarter-eagles (two-and-a-halfs)	28,393,865
Ones	19,371,364
	198,885,801

Being within a fraction of 15 per cent. of the total gold coinage. I have no data to show how much of the small coinage is in circulation now; but the total gold circulation is $581,970,254. It would be safe to assume that—

The fives, twos, threes, and ones amount to 15 per cent. of that sum, which would be	$87,295,537
Ones and twos of Treasury notes	57,941,461
Fives of Treasury notes and national banks	164,500,000
	309,736,998
Total silver coin is	242,701,932
Total small notes and small coin	552,438,930

Of this amount silver furnishes only a little over two-fifths, leaving $309,736,998 to be supplied by silver and silver certificates in case small notes and small gold coin are withdrawn.

Now, sir, with this large amount of small circulation given up to bank notes and gold, and which is the legitimate place for silver, and with our large silver production ($46,800,000 per annum), and with silver depreciated as compared with gold, it seems almost criminal that we do not give to silver and silver certificates their rightful place in our circulation. There is not the slightest danger that silver will not to the extent I have indicated circulate at par with gold. It is no answer to this to say that gold is intrinsically worth 15 per cent. more than silver. For as to the essential and necessary purposes to which silver under this view will be assigned it would be without a competitor. Gold of large coinage can not compete; so of bank notes. Hence silver, having the monopoly of an essential business, will to the extent of that business be of equal value with other money. Why, Mr. President, what are we to do with the silver produced in this country unless we give it a fairer chance in circulation? The production is increasing, last year being the largest production we have ever had, it being only $100,000 in 1859, while the production of gold in 1859 was $50,000,000, and last year only $32,000,000. Are we not so acting as to discredit, to drive out of use this immense production of our mines? That, sir, in my judgment, is exactly what we are doing when we allow small notes and small gold coins to circulate in the channels which legitimately belong to silver or small silver certificates.

The committee ought to have considered and reported upon these important measures. They ought also to have considered and reported upon the complete rehabilitation of silver. I do not believe that you can make value out of nothing. I do not believe in fiat money, whether the fiat be applied to paper or to coin. I do not believe that the mere say-so of the Government can make and impart value where value did not before exist. But I do believe, and the history of the times shows it, that where there is intrinsic value already existing, as in silver, you can lessen that value by unfriendly legislation or you can add to or increase it by contrary action. And what has been our course in reference to it? Discrimination against silver. We have at this end of the Avenue passed a law which puts silver upon an equal footing with gold. A gold dollar and a silver dollar are equal in law, although intrinsically there is 15 cents difference; they do now circulate as equals. But what is done at the other end of the Avenue? Silver is discriminated against; it is not paid out to the creditors of the Government; it is not received at the custom-house. This action of the executive department of the Government, contrary to the expressed will of the legislative department, has a tendency to keep up the difference in value between gold and silver as it now exists. That action is in addition to the want of the friendly legislation which might take place, as I have pointed out. And what is the result of all this? That we have become a large exporter of silver bullion. Instead of filling the channels of commerce adapted to that kind of coin by the coin itself or by silver certificates of small denominations (there are none now, I believe, less than $20), we are so acting as to increase the difference between gold and silver, and to drive the latter to foreign countries for a market. That ought to be reversed.

I want it distinctly understood that it is my opinion that when you have done all you can to give silver the monopoly of the small change needed in business, and a monopoly of the small business of the country, if you have more of it, so that it overflows these channels and crowds the marts of general commerce, foreign and domestic, then you will discover in actual practice the difference between the value of gold and silver; and I admit that when we have reached that time we shall be obliged to readjust the ratio between these metals either by enlarging the silver dollar or diminishing the gold dollar or by doing a little of both, so as to bring them on a nearer equality. But we have not reached that point yet by a long distance. We can delay the coming of that time by the means I have suggested. As long as we can prevent these metals from becoming rivals and competitors in actual use by assigning each to its appropriate sphere, allowing each to do the business it is suitable for, so long we can keep them in circulation on equal terms even with the present ratio. But if we fail in this duty and continue our present policy of allowing small bank notes and small coins to compete with silver, it will be but a short period when the difference in value between the two metals will become disastrously evident.

We are now, as we are told by the advocates of the bill, in the presence of a threatened contraction of about $200,000,000 by the payment of the 3 per cent. bonds of the United States. I have shown that we have small paper money and small gold coins which are filling the channels which silver and silver certificates ought to fill and which they would fill at par with gold sufficient to meet this contraction, and that is a safer and better mode than the other. Last year we exported twelve and a half millions of silver bullion from this country. It was exported because by our unfriendly action toward it it was made cheaper here than it was in the countries to which it was exported, since if it had been as high here as it was there it would not have paid the expense of transportation across the ocean to seek a place where it was of no more value than it was at the place whence it was started. That was an injury to our people, an injury not only in the mode in which I have pointed out by diminishing the metals which could be used for the purpose of filling the small channels of commerce to which I have alluded, but it was an injury in this respect also that it was a competitor in the markets of the world with our corn, cotton, wheat, pork, and other exports. In the long run no nation, except a metal, a gold or silver producing one, can afford to export continually of its coin to other countries, because if it did it would soon be exhausted. Foreign trade for any considerable period will be found to be but an exchange of commodities between different nations. At one time the balance may be one way, at another time it may be another; but in a series of years there must be an equilibrium between the exports and the imports or else the country making larger imports will be compelled to pay the difference in coin and thus deprive itself of that article. So when we put twelve and a half million dollars of bullion on our export list, which must be paid for in the way I have suggested, we put there that which supplants twelve and a half millions of our other exports, which the nation receiving them can only pay for out of its surplus commodities; and if we had not sent this twelve and a half million dollars of bullion there they would have taken an equal amount of our other exports.

There is another obvious measure for giving us relief which the committee did not consider, and that is the reserve in the Treasury of $150,000,000, which has over and over again been shown by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], a member of the Finance Committee, to be at least $50,000,000 too large. If that reserve had been fixed at $100,000,000 there would have been turned loose for the currency of the country $50,000,000; for bear in mind that every dollar locked up in the Treasury, withheld from circulation, is that much contraction.

Then, sir, there is another cause, and a very obvious cause, of contraction which might have tempted the consideration of the Committee on Finance to seek for its removal, and that is the immense surplus annually produced by the excessive taxation to which the people of this country are subjected. That causes contraction in this way: it takes unnecessarily from the people $100,000,000 and puts it into the Treasury, and although we may pay it out in the purchase of bonds, we at least perform this kind of an operation very deleterious to the people, we take the money from those who buy our taxed goods, buy the whisky, the tobacco, the farming implements, the clothing, and all the other products of common use upon which the tariff is levied. These people need the money. Most of them are laborers. We take it from them and put it in the Treasury. We lose two or three months' time after putting it there before we put it out, and then we pay it to men who have no use for it, who do not want it, who want the interest-bearing bonds of the Government, and not its coin.

Again, sir, this large surplus and high taxation have this very injurious effect upon the country: It appreciates the bonds of the Government largely above par. We are under obligation to do nothing which would discredit the bonds, or which would reduce them below their par value; but we are under an equal obligation to the people, to the taxpayers, to do nothing to unduly raise their market price, when we are compelled by this large surplus in the Treasury to go into the market and buy bonds at whatever they may cost. I repeat we are under an obligation to do nothing which will unduly advance them in price, because the effect of it will be simply to cost the people more money in order to get in their bonds. The mere fact of the knowledge on the part of the bondholders that we are to have a surplus which we can not use except in buying bonds tends to appreciate their value. The Government is not like a private individual in reference to a purchase of these bonds. A private individual may go into the market and if he finds the bonds too high he is at liberty to decline purchasing and to invest his money somewhere else, in some other business; but when the Government has a surplus and the bonds are out and not due it has but one of two alternatives, either to buy the bonds at whatever price may be charged or to hold the money in the Treasury without interest, to the serious contraction of the currency. The result is that the Government is powerless in the market; is obliged to submit to just such terms as the bondholders dictate.

Under these circumstances the Finance Committee should have made some recommendation or reported some plan by which taxation could be reduced and the surplus extinguished. The people are overburdened with taxes, they cry aloud for relief, and we not only give them no relief, but decline to consider that question at all. In our haste and eagerness to conciliate the national banks and induce them to give us a currency which the Government can better furnish, we forget the interests of the millions of toilers whose labors have created the wealth of the nation.

Now, Mr. President, I have noticed some of the measures, some of the expedients all of which I deem valuable, which might have been adopted by the Finance Committee as furnishing a complete remedy against this threatened contraction of the currency. I will now proceed to state some positive objections to the bill under consideration.

In the first place it will raise the premium on United States bonds. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], I believe, stated the other day that during the time we have been discussing this measure a certain class of United States bonds had advanced 4 or 5 per cent. The mere discussion of the measure, the mere promise, the mere hope that this bill would pass has already, according to the authority of the Senator from New Jersey, appreciated the bonds 4 or 5 per cent. in value. We do not want that done, as I have said. If it is done legitimately, if it is the mere result of the market without stimulating legislation on our part, we can not complain. But representing as we do the taxpayers of this country, it is our duty not to give extra advantages, extra value to bonds, whereby the price we must pay for them would be increased. I have quoted the author of the bill in favor of the proposition that its passage will appreciate the bonds. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] tells us the same, and so does my distinguished friend who sits at my right, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Then again—and that is one of the most serious objections to this bill—it will tend to perpetuate the national debt and the national banks as banks of issue. Suppose we pass this measure and do nothing more. As stated by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and concurred in by other Senators who advocate the bill, we postpone to the time when the last bond shall fall due the consideration of the question what shall be the substitute for the national-bank currency. What, sir, will be the effect of such a course? As we approach the time, the year 1907, in which the last bonds fall due, all the currency we have outside of gold and silver and $346,000,000 legal-tender Treasury notes being in national-bank notes, the question will present itself to the country, what is to be done for a paper currency in the future. By passing this bill and rejecting all other means to prevent contraction we acknowledge that we are incapable of furnishing a substitute for national-bank notes, and we tell the country that it is a problem which we can not solve; and what will be the effect? Manifestly a general conviction that there is and can be no suitable substitute. The proposition will be made and received with favor to extend the bonds for an unlimited time in order that they may be made a basis for paper circulation. It is argued here to-day that there can be no safe foundation for a paper currency but the bonds of the United States. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] put this view in the strongest light and with great plausibility. He says:

> The national-bank note is the best form of paper money, because its payment is absolutely secure. No misfortune can break it. The bank may fail and yet the note is good and passes current, because the bonds of the United States deposited are immediately available to redeem every dollar in circulation. This security of the noteholder is the foundation of the whole system. No other security can possibly take the place of Government bonds.

"No other security can possibly take the place of Government bonds." As we approach 1907, when the last bond is to be paid, and if paid another currency must be proposed, the proposition will be met by the argument that "no other security can take the place of the Government bonds."

He proceeds to elaborate and enforce this position:

> This has been tried in the United States over and over with disastrous results. Coin reserves in the vaults of banks disappear at the first sign of a panic. Even reserves placed under a board of control of a system of State banks have proved insufficient. Compulsory redemption in deposit banks in commercial cities is equally insecure. Mortgages on real estate, State bonds, and commercial paper have over and over again been found an inadequate security. No security for the noteholder in the custody of banks or bankers is safe against failures and panics. No law or threat of punishment can prevent other creditors of a bank from obtaining a preference over the noteholder, who, in all former systems of banking, is the last to be protected and the first to suffer loss. The highest form of security, that of the Government itself, safely deposited in the custody of the Government, is the only one that has proved effective in favor of the noteholder. This fundamental principle of safe banking is now practically recognized by the chief commercial nations who alone have the established credit to support and maintain paper money at par with coin, and all other paper money is a forced loan by a government, only justified by extreme necessity.

This argument made here to-day in favor of this bill, in favor of granting more power and more privileges to the banks to induce them to issue circulation, will be made with tenfold more force at the time when all the bonds begin to fall due. The force of the argument of the Senator from Ohio will be intensified by the then urgent and pressing necessity to provide an immediate substitute. The people will be told, "You can not get any other paper money but national-bank notes; no other is safe; you have discarded United States Treasury notes, discarded the State-bank system; you have discarded State bonds as a means of protecting the noteholder," and at last under the pressure the country will be forced, unless we take steps in the mean time to inaugurate a new system—will be forced, out of sheer necessity, to consent to the extension of the national debt as the sole means of furnishing a suitable and sufficient currency. So I oppose the bill on that ground.

I do not believe that either the national banks are or that a national debt is a blessing, and you can not have the one without the other. You can not have the national-bank notes without the national debt; that is, you can not have the national banks as banks of issue. You may have them for other purposes of banking.

But, Mr. President, I object that the advantages given to these banks by this bill are wholly unnecessary as a preventive of contraction. It is but another yielding to the demands of the banks for more rights, more privileges, more protection from the Government. Two years ago, when we had the internal-revenue bill under consideration, the banks came and demanded the taking off of all their taxes except the tax on circulation. We yielded to that demand, but against my vote. It was argued in favor of granting that exemption that they made their customers pay the tax; they did not pay it themselves. I remember distinctly that the two Senators from West Virginia, one now on this floor and the other not, pressed that consideration before the Senate. They said, "Take off these taxes and you will decrease the interest which the banks charge; you will make the currency cheaper to the country;" and what is the result? It is, that after we had taken off all these taxes except on circulation, interest last year in the city of New York was higher than it was the year before and higher than it ever had been except for two years.

In 1874 call loans in New York were worth 3.8 per cent. interest; commercial paper was 6.4 per cent. In 1875 call loans were 3 per cent. and commercial paper 5.8 per cent. These were the only two years in which commercial interest was greater than it was during the past year. In 1876 it was 5.3; in 1877 5.2; in 1878 5.5; in 1879 4.4; in 1880 5.3; in 1881 5.2; in 1882 5.4; in 1883, the year we were to have cheap money by the reduction of the taxes on the banks, it was 5.7 per cent. So it appears that the extraordinary favors and privileges which we grant to the banks, instead of inuring to the benefit of the country, but stimulate their cupidity and greed to demand more and extort greater exactions.

These banks already possess privileges granted by the Government which no one else possesses, and I know I can not describe those advantages any better than they were described by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. I mean to show the Senate and show the country what exclusive rights, what exclusive privileges, what great and enormous advantages these banks have over other people, and I will do it in the language of the author of this bill, the Senator from New Jersey:

> The national banks are made the depositories of Government money for a considerable period of time without the Government exacting interest, and the United States Treasury is made the clearing-house for the redemption of their notes when presented for payment, which is not often, owing to the quality of the security which stands behind them; and it is not unreasonable to suppose that, compared with banking on any other principle or with less apparent security than the Government bonds, the banks thus organized will have a decided advantage in securing the patronage of deposits, which forms a very important item in the banker's profits.
> "Congress has bestowed on the owners of United States bonds this great exclusive grant over all other people—it has made their notes money. Who but a national banking association can pay his debt to another by giving his own note? If I owe a debt which must be paid in money, my note, however well secured, will not pay it. Again, I pay interest on my note and they draw interest on theirs."
> In short, no successful banking, purely as such, can be maintained with profit except under the national system while the system remains, as it has always been, the pet child of Congress.

We have given them all these advantages; we have taken off two-thirds of the taxes which were imposed on them; we have given them the privileges described here of paying their debts with their own notes and drawing interest on what they owe, when everybody else has to pay interest; we have made them, in the language of the author of this bill, "the pet children of Congress;" and yet they come here and threaten us with what? That they will contract unduly the currency of this country, destroy its business interests, depreciate all property, make it more difficult to pay debts, unless we go further than we have done and add to the already enormous advantages which they now possess and which the Senator from New Jersey has well said entitle them to be considered as the "pet children of Congress." I do not want "any pet children of Congress." The people of this country want "no pet children of Congress." It is our duty to take care of the interests of the great mass of the American people, and not to select a class of banks or other persons and make them our "pets," giving them undue advantages over the balance of the community in the race of life, thus adding to the already too great differences between those who possess money and those who do not. So I am opposed to making them any more "pets" than they are. They are "pets" enough.

I shall now show some of the other advantages which they possess, which they are admitted to possess by the Senator from Ohio as well as the Senator from New Jersey. They have the advantage of possessing by the action of Congress, by the supervision of Congress, by the other advantages which are given them, the confidence of the community more than other banks. That is urged in their favor. The Senator from New Jersey, I notice, by a nod assents to that proposition.

There is in this country, according to the reports of the Comptroller of the Currency, $1,523,366,989 of all kinds of currency. That sum, I mean, is the total currency of this country, all the money that is in it. Of this $150,000,000 is locked up in the Treasury of the United States as a reserve, and does not enter into the circulating medium at all, which leaves $1,473,366,988 as the total circulating medium of this country. Of this the national-bank notes are about one-fourth in amount. Their deposits, out of a total currency of $1,473,000,000, amount to $1,063,000,000. In other words, they have on deposit more than two-thirds of the whole circulation of this country. That is an enormous advantage.

Now, let us see some of the other advantages which they possess. The aggregate capital of all the national banks is $509,700,000. Their loans amount to $1,309,200,000, a little more than two and a half times their capital. That is another one of the great advantages which they possess. They not only have, according to the Senator from New Jersey, this advantage over anybody else, that while all others have to pay interest on their debts the banks draw interest on theirs, but they have this other advantage, that they can loan by some sort of necromancy two and a half times as much as they possess while no one else can loan even so much as he possesses. With a capital of $509,000,000 their loans amount to $1,309,000,000. With all this Senators say that it will break up the country, it will destroy the interests of the people unless we give them 10 per cent. more advantage than they already have. That is exactly the position which they occupy.

That is not all, Mr. President. They make this loan of two and a half times their capital when they have $75,810,237 of unloanable capital that they can not put out to loan at all, so that out of a loanable capital of $423,889,763 they make loans to the amount I have stated, being more than three times the amount of their loanable capital.

That is not all. While they loan to the people of this country more than three times their loanable capital, they at the same time draw interest on $379,486,359 of United States bonds, three-fifths and more of their capital. With more than three-fifths of their capital invested in United States bonds upon which they draw interest, with $75,000,000 of unloanable capital in addition, they succeed somehow or other in loaning to the people of this country $1,309,200,000, or more than three times their capital.

I have stated that their deposits are $1,063,000,000, and their loans $1,309,000,000 and some odd thousand dollars. Comparing them, we see that the deposits form the great basis of their loans. Their deposits furnish the amount within $245,000,000 of their whole loans.

Oh, but it is said that these banks with all the advantages are making no profit, that they are losing money, and therefore we must give them an additional advantage to prevent them from contracting the currency to the destruction of the business interests of this country. I have looked into that a little, and there never was a greater mistake in the world. I undertake to say that there is no interest in this country that is as prosperous as the national banks.

I take from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency (page 118) dividends of these bank on their capital for six months from the 1st of September, 1882, to the 1st of March, 1883. In New England the dividends were 3.51 per cent. for those six months; 7.2 per cent. per annum; in the Middle States they were 4.33 per cent. for six months, or 8.66 per cent. per annum; in the Southern States they were 4.14 per cent. for six months, or 8.28 per cent. per annum. In the Western States dividends were 4.93 per cent. for six months, or 9.86 per cent. per annum. In the Pacific States they were 6.60 per cent. for six months, or 13.20 per cent. per annum. The Comptroller makes an average—I do not see how he does it—of the dividends of all the national banks of the United States at 4.20 per cent. for these six months, when only the banks in the New England States come under 4 per cent. They are 3.51; the Middle States, 4.33; the Southern States, 4.14; the Western States, 4.93; the Pacific States, 6.60; and yet he reaches the conclusion that the average of the dividends throughout the United States of all these banks is only 4.20 per cent. But I will adopt that as correct.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him for a moment I can aid him by a suggestion. The average would not necessarily be the result of the addition of these several figures together and the dividing of them by a figure representing the total number of classes, but it would require an average of the capital, and it is very likely the fact that the banks which make the smaller earnings are the greater in number and the greater in capital.

Mr. GEORGE. I thought of that, but I did not think that New England owned so much more capital in banks than the Middle States, including the great cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore.

Mr. PLUMB. The State of Massachusetts has over $10,000,000 in national banking more than the entire State of New York, the city of New York included.

Mr. GEORGE. I said I would adopt the Comptroller's average, 4.20 for six months, or 8.40 per cent. per annum. That was the dividend. I have not been reading the net earnings; I was reading the dividend declared by banks upon their capital. Their earnings were $26,432,934.46; their dividends extended only to $20,285,102.62, leaving $6,147,831.84 of earnings that were not divided. More than one-third of these net earnings were not divided; if they had been, the dividend, being on the total net earnings, would have been over 11.20 per cent. A pretty good showing. No other business in the country can make such a showing as that, unless perhaps some of the railroads which have been subsidized by the Government.

These earnings, it will be noticed, are not calculated on the returns of the best-managed banks alone, but they show the average of gains of all banks, including those that are well managed as well as those which have been conducted recklessly or even fraudulently. The result is reached after every loss by reckless speculation, by bad debts and peculations, has been deducted.

I wish now to call attention to the difference as it affects the stockholders between earnings by the national banks and the earnings made by merchants, by farmers, by mechanics, and other trades or professions. Before the balance of net earnings is struck in a national bank every officer connected with the administration of its affairs, every president, every cashier, every teller, every waiter, every lawyer, and every other person who had anything to do with its affairs is paid his salary. Every loss sustained and every expense incurred by the bank during the year is deducted, so that a stockholder receives his dividend of 11.20 per cent., though he might have been engaged in any other business had he seen proper. He might have been a lawyer, he might have been a merchant or a manufacturer, and given his time wholly to that except to attend the meeting of stockholders and to vote for directors, and he receives clear of his personal attention and supervision 11.20 per cent.

Take the other business of the country. Take the farmers or the merchants; they may make apparently more than 11.20 per cent., but they do not deduct in striking the balance a salary or wages for themselves for personal attention to the business. For instance, we have a farmer who may make 10 or 15 or it may be 20 per cent. some one year; and how is it done? He works in the field himself, his children work in the field, and at the end of the year when he estimates his profits he does not take out a thousand dollars, as the banks take out $10,000 or $50,000, for his supervision or his labor. He does not charge against the products of his farm the value of the labor of his children, but his profit is compounded of his labor and their labor and the products of his capital. I say there is no interest in this country which produces in that way without cost to the owner as much as 11 per cent., and yet they come here and say they are losing money, that they can not afford to hold these bonds, and we must give them further advantages.

Mr. President, I am opposed to yielding to this demand I do not want any interest in this country however necessary, however large, however respectable in numbers or character, to have anything from the Government of the United States that is denied to the great mass of the people of this country. I want no pet children of this Government and no stepchildren. Let all her children be treated alike. Whether they have money in national banks, or whether they delve in the mines, or work in the factories, or plow in the fields, or pursue any other calling, they are all entitled to equal rights and equal privileges. So long as I hold a seat on this floor I shall never under any pressure cast a vote which will give to any privileged class, to any "pet" children of this Government, a privilege and an advantage denied to the great mass of the people themselves.

Mr. President, I have said about what I intended to say upon this measure. I would be glad to know that the result of our deliberations upon this subject would be different from what it will be. I am not certain that the measure offered will prove effectual to remedy the evil which it is intended to reach. I am sure that if it should prove effectual it is not the best and the fairest means to the people of this country to adopt in order to meet that evil. I think there are other means which I have pointed out to furnish the remedy for this great evil. I do not expect, I have not hoped by anything I could say, to change the vote of any member of the Senate, all of whom probably know more about this subject than I do. I have only endeavored to explain as clearly as I could the reasons which induce me to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, and, if that fails, to vote against the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. VEST. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

Mr. BROWN. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That whenever any of the bonds of the United States become subject to redemption, and such bonds are deposited with the Treasurer of the United States as security for the circulating notes of any national banking association, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to exchange the notes hereinafter authorized to be issued for such bonds, at their par value and accrued interest, or he may exchange the notes to be issued as aforesaid, at their par value, for standard gold or silver coin, and redeem said bonds therewith; and the deposit of lawful money to redeem the outstanding circulation of said banking association may be made in legal-tender notes or the notes hereinafter authorized; and thereafter the circulating notes of said bank shall be redeemed at the Treasury of the United States, and when so redeemed they shall be cancelled and destroyed.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be printed and engraved Treasury notes of the United States, with such devices and inscriptions as he may direct and approve, in denominations of ten, twenty, fifty, one hundred, and one thousand dollars, which shall be made payable on demand at the office of the assistant treasurer in the city of New York, in standard gold or silver coin, when presented in sums of not less than $100; and said notes shall be signed by the Treasurer and countersigned by the Register of the Treasury, or their signatures thereto engraved. Said notes shall be receivable by the United States for all taxes, customs, dues, demands, and claims of the United States, and shall be received at par in all parts of the United States in payment for all salaries and other debts and demands owing by the United States to individuals, corporations, and associations within the United States, except when some other mode of payment is provided by law; and when received into the Treasury the same may be reissued. And in order to provide for the prompt redemption of the Treasury notes thus authorized to be issued the Secretary of the Treasury shall maintain a redemption fund, in standard gold and silver coin, by setting aside from accruing surplus revenues, from time to time, or from the exchange of legal-tender notes, or the Treasury notes in this section authorized, for standard gold or silver coin, such sums as with the fund now held in the Treasury for the redemption of the legal-tender notes will constitute not less than 20 per cent. of the aggregate of the outstanding legal-tender notes and of the Treasury notes hereby authorized: Provided, That the Treasury notes thus authorized to be issued in exchange and redemption of the bonds described in the first section of this act shall not exceed the amount of the note circulation of the national banking associations outstanding and secured by such bonds.

SEC. 3. That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this amendment the Senator from Missouri calls for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. I do not know how he would vote. I should vote in the negative.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 36; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB. I offer what I send to the desk as an additional section, and I want to call the attention of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] especially to it, in the hope that he will consent, so far as he is authorized to do so, that this may be incorporated in the bill. I ask that it be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as an additional section to the bill:

SEC. 3. The organization of banks having a paid-up capital of $100,000 or less shall be permitted on a deposit of not less than $10,000 of the bonds of the United States drawing not less than 4 per cent. interest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. PLUMB. Since the passage of the law of 1881 authorizing the organization of banks by a deposit of not to exceed 25 per cent. of the amount of their capital in bonds, the organization of national banks in the Western country and in the Southern country has been largely increased. The two hundred and sixty-two banks organized during the last year, the table of which is found on the first page of the Comptroller's report for 1883, average only $100,000 capital to the bank, while the average of all the banks of the United States exclusive of those was $150,000 and inclusive of those $140,000, showing the disposition on the part of communities where capital is limited and where banks of small capital are desired to avail themselves of this system under the new plan authorizing them to organize with a smaller amount of bonds.

I have believed that we should gradually come to a time when the national banking system would maintain itself as a system of deposit and discount irrespective of currency. I have believed so much in a system of that kind that I supposed the people of the United States the moment they became thoroughly and everywhere accustomed to its advantages would take up that system, and that we should therefore have reserved, irrespective of the expiration of the debt, the very best features of, and in fact all that I regard as of value in, the entire national banking system. I have regarded this provision of the law permitting the organization of national banks with a small amount of bonds as a very important step in that direction, and the result has justified what I anticipated.

Now, I want to go one step further. Of the banks organized in the Southern States only one or two, I think, had as much as or more than $100,000 capital; of the banks organized in Kansas none had as much as $100,000; of the banks organized in Nebraska none as much as $100,000; and, in fact, in all those remote sections of the country where heretofore the national banking system has not obtained it is now extending itself and with great resulting benefit to the communities, because they can organize with less bonds, and that means more loanable funds, because, as I explained the other day, nearly 35 per cent. of the actual loanable fund of the bank is subtracted from the amount it has to loan and locked up in the premium on bonds and in the excess required by law to be retained in the Treasury.

So far as we can consistently relieve the banks against that burden and encourage men with small means and communities of limited capital to take up with the system we shall extend its benefits in a direction which will do more, as I think, to give the system permanence than anything else we can do. When I say permanence, of course I mean permanence without reference to the issuance of currency, because I think the time is coming when that function will have largely ceased; but in the mean time the banks will take the bonds and organize in places where small capital is required, and the smaller the amount of bonds required the more banks will be organized, and therefore the greater the benefits of the system which will be derived in communities now lacking really solvent methods and plans and systems of banking.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not feel warranted to accept this amendment, quite independent of its merits or demerits. The question of banking and the question of currency are wholly distinct. You may have a very bad currency with a very excellent system of banking, and you may have a very bad system of banking with an excellent system of currency. The bill now before the Senate in no way affects the banking system. It refers entirely to the question of the currency notes and the proposed increase in the ratio to be issued by the Government of the United States upon the deposit of bonds.

I would say to the Senator that there is a great deal in what he suggests in regard to allowing banks to organize upon as small a basis of capital as is expedient and safe. It is very true that it may be convenient in sparsely settled and impoverished regions of the country to have banks authorized with a small basis of capital; but there nevertheless is a broad and wise policy against permitting banks without the responsibility of capital to assume that influence in a community which an organization that goes by the name of a bank, especially by the name of a national bank, will naturally possess.

The Committee on Finance will be glad to receive from the Senator this proposition and consider it in committee, and we there may discuss, as we have discussed before, how far we may reduce the nucleus of capital required as a deposit for the creation of a bank. At this time the minimum is $50,000 and from that as great as it may be seen fit to aggregate the capital. I do not say what would be the action of the committee on that subject, but it is a wholly distinct question from the one now before the Senate. We are dealing with currency. This proposes to touch the question of banking. The two need have no necessary relations, and in the present bill I hope that they will not be sought to be joined.

Therefore, without regard to the merit or demerit of the Senator's proposition, I hope he will submit it in the form of a bill and send it to the Committee on Finance, where not only will it be discussed but where we shall be very glad, I think I may say in the presence of the members of that committee, to hear the views of the Senator. I hope he will not press the amendment to the bill at this time.

Mr. PLUMB. I think the Senator is either mistaken or he has improperly described this amendment. At all events he has spoken of it as an amendment authorizing the organization of banks with $10,000 capital. That is not the intent of the amendment, and I do not think its language will warrant that interpretation.

Mr. BAYARD. I did not mean to use that language. I meant to say it was really in effect the authorization of the issuance of currency upon a smaller amount of bonds than the law now permits.

Mr. PLUMB. Then the Senator did not express the idea which he intended. But this is germane to the subject of this bill. It will be observed that the only increase of the currency during the last calendar year was from the organization of new banks. In other words, the old banks did not take out new currency and the new banks did. There were nearly $29,000,000 added to the currency last year by the organization of new banks, and much the larger portion of those were banks that were organized with the minimum amount of bonds. Now, if that process could be kept up and the currency diffused, so to speak, by the organization of new banks all over the country, it would largely tend to prevent exactly that which we are now legislating against, to wit, the contraction of the currency. If we could so liberalize the present law as that two hundred and sixty-two more banks would take out charters and the requisite amount of currency during the present calendar year, we should have done more than anything else not only to put this system upon a solid basis but to relieve against the apprehension which we now have in mind.

I think, therefore, that this amendment is entirely germane to the purpose of the bill. Besides that, there is no rule upon this subject. When we came two years ago to provide for the issuance of 3 per cent. bonds we remodeled the entire national banking system upon that bill, and that all came through the Finance Committee. We provided for the issue of the gold certificates; we provided against the contraction of the currency; we provided for the organization of banks on the deposit of 25 per cent. of the amount of their capital in bonds. This proposition is in fact a great deal more germane to the pending bill than any of those provisions were to the funding bill. The fact is, all the elements of national banks are cognate; they are connected with each other; they are proper to be treated at the same time, in the same connection, and in the same bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. CALL. Before the vote is taken upon the bill I desire to read a letter from one of the most distinguished financiers of the city of New York, and one most largely concerned in the management of the financial interests of that great city. The letter is as follows:

NEW YORK, February 23, 1884.

DEAR SIR: My profound interest in the subject under discussion in the Senate and your polite consideration of my hasty letter of the 14th instant induced me to trespass upon you once more to ask your perusal of the inclosed point. I would add that my bank has become entirely indifferent to the privilege of note issue, and I believe this sentiment to be shared by most of the banks of the large cities. New York, with a privilege of issue amounting to $44,000,000, is issuing to-day something less than fifteen millions of notes. Chicago, with a privilege of fifteen millions, issues something less than half a million dollars of notes. The one matter of urgency upon which I am by no means indifferent is the restoration of public confidence, to which the banks and the community in general must look for that prosperity without which there is no acceptable employment for money, whether it be capital, deposits, or note issues of the banks, or the means of investors in general.

Very respectfully, yours,

WM. P. ST. JOHN.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL, Senator of United States, Metropolitan Hotel, Washington, D. C.

I do not intend to delay the Senate, but simply to say that these considerations are very obvious to my mind to be true, that the restoration of public confidence is more important than anything else connected with this measure.

If it were not that the Senate has already decided by its votes upon the question that no amendment will be tolerated upon the bill now before the Senate, I, in deference to the views so ably expressed by the president of the Mechanics' National Bank of New York, would offer as a substitute the bill known as the Potter bill, introduced in the other House.

If, as has already been decided by the Senate, the present system of national banks is to be continued, there can be no question that the next proper measure is to assure and strengthen the public confidence in them and allay any fears that may exist in the public mind of danger to proceed from any considerable withdrawal of the currency. If this be true, there can be no more certain or less objectionable method than a system which will substitute a new form of the public credit in the shape of a 2½ per cent. bond for the present 4 and 4½ and 3 per cent. bonds, redeemable in like manner and at the same time as the bonds for which they are substituted.

The scheme proposed in the bill is to fund the outstanding bonded debt in a new form at a lower rate of interest, neither extending the time of paying the national debt nor increasing its amount. What can be the objection to this? No one will say that a reduction of the debt is objectionable. If the debt is not to be continued permanently, the objection, if any, must be found in some other direction. It has been suggested that it will prevent the reduction of taxation, but this is an error, because the bill provides for an appropriation only of the money in the Treasury, whatever it may be, which can be conveniently used for this purpose, and leaves this to the discretion of the Secretary, and if necessary this discretion may be limited in this bill as Congress may direct.

What, then, is the objection to a scheme which proposes to substitute a 2½ per cent. bond as a basis of currency instead of a 3, 4, or 4½ bond, and the reduction of the tax on circulation to one-quarter of 1 per cent. on the 2½ bonds, to be a deduction from the interest paid upon bonds held by the United States Treasury to secure said notes. I am inclined to the opinion that as long as no other issue of paper currency is allowed, any form of security that might be demanded would be given the Government for the use of its credit without interest. But that is not the question here, and but few seem to agree with this opinion.

We have then the single question before us of the form in which the bonded debt now existing should be used as a basis of circulation without extending the time of paying the national debt or increasing its amount within these limits. What objection can be found to a plan which proposes a bond at a lower rate of interest without increasing the charges of the debt one cent or extending the time or altering the method of its payment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the bill read as it has been amended in Committee of the Whole. I did not have the good fortune to be present, and therefore should like to have the bill read as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Secretary read the bill as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That upon any deposit already or hereafter made of any United States bonds bearing interest, in the manner required by law, any national banking association making the same shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations, in blank, registered and countersigned as provided by law, not exceeding in the whole amount the par value of the bonds deposited: Provided, That at no time shall the total amount of such notes issued to any such association exceed the amount at such time actually paid in of its capital stock. And that all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That associations organized for the purpose of issuing notes payable in gold under the provisions of section 5185 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, upon the deposit of any United States bonds bearing interest with the Treasurer of the United States, shall be entitled to receive circulating notes to the amount and in the manner prescribed in this act for other national banking associations.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I have not desired to take up the time of the Senate in the discussion of this bill nor do I at present intend to do so. Much has been said by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] this afternoon which meets my approval. I favored the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

If the establishment of our present banking system were now the question, I might take views different from what a majority of the Senate would probably take on some important questions connected with it. But the present banking system is for years to come firmly fixed. The banks have been chartered, and during the period of their charters we have no right to disturb them in the enjoyment of their chartered privileges. I do not consider it therefore the proper time to engage in a general discussion of this question.

I believe in the present state of the country there is too much stringency in the currency. The circulation is not all that the country needs at this time. I believe also that the United States bonds are ample security for their face or par value, and I think, as we must have the national banks till the expiration of their charters, it would be better to permit them, in the present state of things, to issue notes to the full face or par value of the bonds which they deposit. In other words, instead of 90 cents in the dollar I would permit them to issue 100 cents in the dollar. I understand that to be substantially what is meant by the original bill now pending. In that view of it I shall give my support to the bill, because I think it would be better under the circumstances if we had that much additional currency put into circulation, and it would be perfectly safe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. COKE and Mr. VEST called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). Mr. President, I understand I am paired with your colleague, the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I should vote "yea," and if he would vote "yea" if present, then I should like to record my vote. I shall record my vote in the affirmative, as I understand the Senator in the chair to indicate that his colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. COCKRELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. If he were present I should vote "nay" and he, I presume, would vote "yea."

Mr. GORMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. VAN WYCK (when Mr. MANDERSON'S name was called). I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. MANDERSON] is confined to his home by sickness.

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. If I were allowed to vote, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 12; as follows:

ADDITIONAL STEEL VESSELS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the special order for to-day, which was superseded for the time being by the bill just disposed of, being the bill (S. 698) to authorize the construction of additional steel vessels for the Navy.

Mr. McPHERSON. I suppose, the hour being so late, that the consideration of the naval bill will hardly be proceeded with this evening, and as I have some amendments to offer to it I should like to submit them now, so that they may be printed by to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the House bills which were received this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill and joint resolution from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 168) for the payment of certain expenses out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives was read twice by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not understand what the Senate has to do with the application of the House contingent fund. As I understand it, they use their contingent fund as we do ours, in their own discretion. This seems to be a joint resolution relating to the appropriation of the contingent fund of the House. I ask that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, that it may be examined to see whether or not I am in error in reference to my view of it.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 16 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 25, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ELLIS. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last the article which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read appeared in the New York Sun.

The Clerk read as follows:

Another report, made up of statements by George F. Brott, a contractor, describes the machinery for getting the contracts through the Department.

Several Congressmen and the Mississippi Senators asked in the summer of 1880 for the establishment of the steamboat service on Pearl River from New Orleans to Columbia, Miss. Brady refused to comply. In February of 1881 Brott, who owned the boat, having failed to secure favorable action at the Contract Office, paid William Lilley $1,000 to aid in the matter. In a short time an order putting on the service was issued. About this time Brady selected from Lilley's collection paintings to the value of $2,000, which were sent to Brady's house. My informant knew that they were not paid for in money. For services in securing the contract Brott gave a fee of several hundred dollars (exact amount forgotten) to E. JOHN ELLIS, member of Congress from New Orleans, and was expected to pay more as the term ran on. The consideration was handed over at the instance and solicitation of ELLIS. On one occasion Brott said to E. JOHN ELLIS:

"You are a member of Dr. Markham's church and a leader in the Sunday school. Did you ever read the story of Samson?"

"Yes; what of it?"

"How did he die?"

"Why he pulled out the pillars of the temple and perished in the crash."

"Yes; and that is just what you are going to do. You are hounding me for money. It is all your own job. Remember Samson."

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, about two years ago I received one evening in my mail a letter which recited a portion of that publication—the portion especially reflecting upon me—which stated that the writer was informed that charges of this character and in these words are on file in the Post-Office Department against me. I could not believe the statement, for I did not imagine it possible that anybody in the world would manufacture any such stuff out of the whole cloth; because even a lie ought to have some sort of foundation, while in this case there was absolutely none whatever. However, I sought Mr. Brott, who was a mail contractor, and whom I knew well, being originally from New Orleans and now a resident of this city. I saw him, showed him the statement, and asked him if he had ever made any such allegation. He seemed just as much surprised as I was, and denied utterly having made such a statement. I insisted then that he should accompany me to the Post-Office Department for the purpose of making his denial, which he did on the following day—the night I saw him was the night I received the communication, and on the following day he accompanied me to the Post-Office Department.

After some hesitation on the part of Mr. Inspector Woodward, and due in part to a little determination on my side, Mr. Inspector Woodward showed me in substance what has been read by the Clerk; not that portion relating to Mississippi Senators or to the Columbia route, but the latter part of the statement. Mr. Brott, in his presence, again solemnly denied ever having made such a statement himself or having indulged in any conversation from which such a statement could be fabricated. Not content with that denial, in the presence of Inspector Woodward, at my request, Mr. Brott sat down and in the presence of this inspector wrote out this denial which I now send to the desk. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that this paper is a copy of the original paper which is on file in the Department, as will be seen by this letter which I also send to the desk and ask the Clerk to read first, because it is a recital by Inspector Woodward that the accompanying paper is an official copy.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 30, 1882.

SIR: In accordance with your request I herewith inclose a copy of the statement made by George F. Brott. The original is on file with the other papers.

Very respectfully,

P. H. WOODWARD, Inspector.

Hon. E. JOHN ELLIS,
House of Representatives.

Mr. ELLIS. I now ask the Clerk to read the statement of Mr. Brott.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 29, 1882.

I am informed that I am reported to have made the following statement to the officers of the Post-Office Department reflecting upon the Hon. E. JOHN ELLIS: "For securing the contract, Donaldsonville to Red River Landing, by steamboat, Brott gave a fee of several hundred dollars, exact amount forgotten, to E. JOHN ELLIS, member of Congress from New Orleans, and was expected to pay more as the term ran on. The consideration was handed over at the instance of ELLIS." I have no recollection of ever having made the above statement, and know the statement to be false as applied to Mr. ELLIS. That I did not pay him any money as stated or promise to pay him any sum whatever.

So far as relates to the statement as to transactions that Dr. B. H. Peterson had with Mr. ELLIS I have to say that I may have reported what had been told me. As to the truth of the statement I know nothing, as I was in New Orleans at the time and had no personal knowledge of the matter.

GEO. F. BROTT.

Mr. ELLIS. That statement, as I have before said, was reduced to writing in the presence of Mr. Inspector Woodward, and I then told him, if I can recall my own words, and I believe I can: "Mr. Woodward, I can not ask you to destroy that document, for it is here bearing a semi-official character—the character of a semi-official document—and I cannot ask you to destroy it. I can ask you however, and I do ask you, to file this paper with the statement of Mr. Brott—this denial—so that if this poison shall ever come to light the denial may go with it."

In addition to that denial Mr. Brott, without any solicitation on my part, published the following letter, which appears in the Post of this city this morning and which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

VINDICATING CONGRESSMAN ELLIS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE POST: The Evening Star of Saturday, 23d instant, under the head of "Star-Route Frauds," published what purports to be extracts from documents on file in the Post-Office Department, copied from the New York Sun. It is not true, as there stated, that "for services in securing the contract Brott gave E. JOHN ELLIS a fee of several thousand dollars, and was expected to pay more as the term ran on." No consideration was either given, promised, or expected. The story of Samson had no connection with the subject-matter or the star-route business. When my attention was first called to this matter I made a statement in writing denying the whole story, and filed it with Mr. Woodward nearly two years ago.

GEORGE F. BROTT.

WASHINGTON, February 24.

Mr. ELLIS. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that it is hardly necessary for me to say anything else than to enter here my solemn denial of the whole story from beginning to end. It is utterly without foundation. It will be observed by this House that this is the report of an inspector, based upon the conversation with George F. Brott, and Mr. Brott's denial is unequivocal and pointed that he never made any such statement and that he never held any such conversation from which said story could be evolved. It is humiliating, Mr. Speaker, to be compelled to stand up here on the floor of this House and explain such a thing; but I desire to call the attention of this House and of the country to something which it seems to me is a little strange in connection with the matter. I believe, if my memory serves me right, that when a few days ago the resolution reported by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads demanding that all of these papers should be furnished by the Department to the House was under consideration in this House, we had a statement from the Postmaster-General, I believe an official communication addressed to this House, that in all probability their publication would be detrimental to the public service at this time. In view of that statement, sir, it is to me a little bit singular that this part of it should be made public which reflects upon me and several other gentlemen. I say it is strange under the circumstances that this should have been allowed to go out when the rest is to be withheld.

But I can not rest content with the denial of Mr. Brott or my own assertion of the utter want of foundation for the story. It is a matter that must be sifted to the bottom. I therefore ask the House to pass the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and the Post-Roads be instructed to investigate the charges reflecting upon Mr. ELLIS, a Representative from Louisiana, in connection with star-route frauds, recently published, and for this purpose are authorized to send for persons and papers.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask the adoption of that resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REBATE OF TOBACCO TAX.

Mr. HISCOCK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to the House of Representatives within what period of time the rebates of tobacco tax, under the act of March, 1883, will be paid to the claimants, and if there is to be any delay in making such payment then the causes thereof, and what can be done to effect the more speedy payment thereof.

Mr. HISCOCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF BOOKS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to this House all the reports, and papers relating thereto, made by Henry L. Williams and ——— Dutcher to the Secretary of the Treasury during the year 1880, having reference to the importation of books.

Mr. TOWNSHEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD TAXES IN DAKOTA.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether an act of the Legislature of the Territory of Dakota, passed March 9, 1883, entitled "An act to provide for the levy and collection of taxes upon the property of railroad companies in this Territory," which act provides in substance for taxing all railroad corporations a per centage on the gross earnings of their railroads, which shall be in lieu of all taxes upon the stock and property of such companies, does not conflict with the organic act establishing said Territory passed March 2, 1861, which last-named act, in defining and limiting the powers of the Territorial Legislature, provides as follows: "Nor shall any discrimination be made in taxing different kinds of property; but all property subject to taxation shall be in proportion to the value of the property taxed."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. RANDALL. I think the resolution had better lie over till we see what is the object of it. If it relates to a contest between railroads and the Territory of Dakota, I would prefer to let the Territory alone and not call in the interference of Federal authority.

Mr. POLAND. The resolution is not offered on behalf of any railroad company. It is offered on behalf of various citizens of Dakota, who claim that under the present law the railroads are escaping proper taxation.

Mr. REED. The other ox is being gored.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SINGLETON addressed the Chair.

Mr. BELFORD. I demand the regular order.

Mr. SINGLETON. I only want to take from the Speaker's table a Senate joint resolution, to which I think there will be no objection.

Mr. BELFORD. I withdraw the demand for the regular order.

REPORT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. SINGLETON. I ask to take from the Speaker's table the Senate joint resolution No. 58, reappointing Professor Porter as one of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Library.

There was no objection.

The joint resolution (S. R. 58) filling an existing vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time.

Mr. SINGLETON. I believe I will change my request and ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution. It is simply to fill a vacancy in the regency of the Smithsonian Institution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be reported.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the existing vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class "other than members of Congress" shall be filled by the reappointment of Noah Porter, of Connecticut, whose term of service has expired.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THE OHIO RIVER FLOODS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. GIBSON. Being unable by reason of sickness to remain here during the call of States, I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution for reference. I ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the sum of $30,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended by the Commissioner of Agriculture in the immediate purchase and distribution of such seeds as are needed for spring planting among sufferers by the recent flood along the Ohio River and its tributaries, who are themselves unable to replace their loss in this respect.

Mr. RANDALL. There is before the Committee on Appropriations a bill already introduced into this House by, I think, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] in relation to the same subject. That bill has been already considered in the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this joint resolution belongs properly to the Committee on Appropriations and not to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr GIBSON. I am willing that the resolution should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I thought the Committee on Agriculture was the proper one, but I have no particular preference.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 169) making an appropriation for the purchase and distribution of seeds to sufferers by the recent floods along the Ohio River and its tributaries was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HEBREWS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I desire to make a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report with an amendment the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States, if not incompatible with the public service, communicate to this House all communications between the Government of Russia and that of the United States not heretofore communicated with respect to the condition and treatment of Hebrews by the Government of Russia, and especially with reference to Hebrew citizens of the United States.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by inserting, between the words "communicated" and "with," in the fifth line, the following words, namely:

"Or embraced in the report of the Secretary of State now being prepared for publication."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to have the report read?

Mr. CLEMENTS. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. CLEMENTS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAPITOL HILL BRANCH POST-OFFICE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting a letter from the postmaster of Washington, D. C., calling attention to the necessity of special legislation to provide for the renting of a building on Capitol Hill to be used as a branch Washington city post-office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REFORM SCHOOL OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the president of the board of trustees of the Reform School of the District of Columbia, calling attention to the refusal of the First Comptroller of the Treasury to allow certain items in the account of said board, on the ground that they are overpayments, not covered by the appropriation for said school, and asking legislative action; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ASA FAULKNER.

Mr. DIBRELL. On Saturday last an adverse report was made from the Committee on War Claims on the petition of Asa Faulkner, of Warren County, Tennessee, asking compensation for cotton alleged to have been taken from him by the Army of the United States. That petition was laid upon the table. I ask that it be placed upon the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That is a right which the gentleman has under the rule; and the report will be placed upon the Private Calendar.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BELFORD. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the Chair will proceed with the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for printing and reference to their appropriate committees. Under this call memorials and resolutions of State and Territorial Legislatures are in order; also resolutions calling for executive information for reference to their appropriate committees.

Mr. OATES introduced a bill (H. R. 5266) to prohibit aliens and foreigners from acquiring title to or owning lands within the United States of America; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon the reference of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the bill should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. OATES. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. Upon examination of the bill the Chair discovers that it does not relate to the public lands alone, but prohibits foreigners from holding title to any land in the United States beyond a certain amount.

Mr. OATES. It does not prescribe any judicial proceedings.

The SPEAKER. Still it presents a legal question.

Mr. OATES. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

POTEAU SLACK-WATER NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Mr. FINERTY. I wish the resolution to go to the Committee on the Judiciary, because a question has been raised as to the propriety of bringing it before the House.

The SPEAKER. There is no legal question involved, as the Chair understands.

Mr. FINERTY. Well, I desire to have the matter referred to the best legal minds of the House.

Mr. CANNON subsequently obtained unanimous consent that the bill be printed in full in the RECORD. It is as follows:

Whereas the lapse of time since the war for the suppression of the rebellion, and death of witnesses, often render it impossible to secure the evidence required and necessary to establish a claim for pension under existing laws, where the pensionable disability or fatal disease is due to causes not established by the records of the War or Navy Departments, and thereby the most meritorious class of claims are frequently defeated, and Congress is therefore called upon to grant relief by special acts, thereby encumbering the Private Calendar, to the detriment of public business: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in the consideration of claims for pension no proof of soundness at the enlistment of the claimant, or of the origin of his disability in service and line of duty, shall be required, if the records of the War or Navy Departments shall show that the claimant or soldier or sailor on account of whose service a pension is claimed was mustered into the United States service, and rendered six months' actual service in the war for the suppression of the rebellion, with his command or upon detached service under orders, and was honorably discharged: Provided, That the disease or disability therefrom exists to an extent that can be discovered and described as pensionable by an examining surgeon, or by a board of examining surgeons, duly appointed and qualified, and can be certified by such surgeon or board of surgeons as not inconsistent with such service, and not due to the dissipation or vicious habits of the soldier: Provided further, That no pension shall be granted when the disability exists in a less degree than one-half, or $4 per month: And provided further, That as to physical deformities which were enumerated severally as constituting a bar to enlistment in the orders given mustering officers and surgeons for the examination of recruits at the date of enlistment, this act shall in no way apply, but that in such cases full proof of the origin of the disability in service and line of duty shall be required before allowing a pension therefor.

SEC. 2. That in considering claims for pension on account of the death of a soldier or sailor who is shown by the records of the War or Navy Department to have rendered six months' actual service in the war for the suppression of the rebellion, with his command or under orders on detached service, the only proof which shall be required as to the origin of the death-cause shall be that the soldier received an honorable discharge, and has suffered a pensionable disability as set forth in section 1 of this act, and which was the efficient cause of and existed continuously to date of death.

SEC. 3. That in considering claims of dependent parents for pension, the fact and cause of death of the soldier or sailor having been shown as required by existing law or as provided in sections 1 and 2 of this act, the fact of a present condition of physical inability, and dependence upon others than those legally bound therefor for support, and the fact that the soldier or sailor left no widow or minor child, shall alone be required to be shown by competent evidence to entitle the names of dependent parents to be placed on the pension-roll, and no proof of dependence at date of death of the soldier shall be required or necessary.

SEC. 4. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the officers and soldiers or sailors of the regular Army or Navy since the 1st day of July, 1865.

Whereas a legislative body, sitting under a State constitution, has no right to sell, to give, or to bargain away forever the taxing power of a State, or by contract to deprive the State forever of the power of taxation, and thus destroy the government which it was appointed to serve; and

Whereas in the principle of construction long approved by the Supreme Court of the United States no hinderance can be seen to rich corporations making contracts with Legislatures as they best may for perpetual exemption from all the burdens of supporting the government; and

Whereas the result of such a principle under the growing tendency to special and partial legislation is to exempt the rich from taxation and cast all the burden of the support of government and the payment of its debts on those who are too poor or too honest to purchase such immunity; and

Whereas in many States of the Union favored corporations now enjoy this immunity from taxation upon many millions of dollars' worth of property, rapidly multiplying in value, but perpetually free from taxes paid by the people: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be, and hereby is, proposed; which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of said Constitution.

The first clause of section 10, Article I, shall be amended so as to read as follows:

"No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law imparing the obligation of contracts, or grant any title of nobility: Provided, however, That no State shall be precluded by the grant of any charter or act of incorporation from taxing the capital stock or property of such corporation; nor shall any charter or act of incorporation heretofore granted, or that may hereafter be granted, by any State be construed to preclude the State from the power of taxation; but the States shall have and retain the full power and right of taxation as if the prohibition to pass laws impairing the obligation of contracts had never been incorporated in this Constitution."

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment of the Constitution of the United States be, and hereby is, proposed; which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of said Constitution:

"ARTICLE —.

ANSON G. McCOOK, Secretary.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, in writing, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, informed the House that the President had approved the bill (H. R. 448) to fix the times for holding the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the northern district of Iowa.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House do now proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

The question was taken.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. On that I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes not counted.

Mr. BLAND. At the suggestion of my colleague I ask consent to withdraw the motion. I understand that it is his desire to proceed with the pleuro-pneumonia bill, and I will not antagonize his wishes in that respect.

There being no objection, the motion was withdrawn.

DISEASES AMONG DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the special order, being the unfinished business coming over from Saturday, the consideration of the bill reported by the Committee on Agriculture.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the special order.

The gentleman from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, in occupying the last hour of general debate to answer the objections that have been urged against the passage of this bill which I have had the honor to report from the Committee on Agriculture, it will not be expected of me that I consume any portion of that time in replying to the Fourth of July orations that have been delivered under the pretext of opposing the bill because, as alleged, some of its provisions are unconstitutional. Whenever any gentleman shall point out in any section of this bill a provision that in his judgment is obnoxious to any principle or provision of the Constitution, I shall deem it not only my duty but my pleasure to respond to him.

I willingly assume the responsibility urged upon me by the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut and the gentleman from Texas, for myself and the committee which I have the honor to represent in the close of this discussion, of proving to the House and to the country that this bill does not in any of its provisions violate either the spirit or the letter of the Constitution.

I expect, sir, to speak very plainly in regard to some of the statements that have been made against this bill, because they are unfair to this extent, that the provisions of the bill itself have not been accurately or fairly quoted. I can not undertake to answer the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HALSELL], who, when I asked him to point out any provision of this bill which in his judgment was unconstitutional, answers: "Yes, the whole bill is unconstitutional." And yet there are provisions of the bill so plainly within the terms of the constitutional authority of Congress, and within the constitutional limit of our power, that a ten-year old child would not controvert the proposition that they are clearly and conclusively within its provisions.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is not the first time that I have heard these objections urged to the passage of this or a similar bill; nor is it the first time on the floor of this House that I have heard not only this question of constitutional infraction raised, but when the argument ceased to have any effect, when legitimate argument against the bill was exhausted, ridicule and epithets have been indulged in by gentlemen simply because the bill is in the interest of the great agricultural masses of the country, and does not seek to build up or aggrandize the power of some corporation or monopoly. Let me say to my distinguished friend from Connecticut and the gentleman from Kentucky, that I am not only a constitutional Democrat—a States-right Democrat—but I am an anti-monopoly Democrat; and when I go to learn a new lesson about my duty as a Democrat, the duty of the proper interpretation of the Constitution of the United States, I will not sit at the feet of the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut, who claims the paternity of the tariff commission bill, that in my judgment is not only an infraction of the Constitution, but the most reprehensible and cowardly surrender of the rights and privileges of this House that has ever occurred since the Government was organized.

Mr. EATON. I hope the gentleman will give me, when he asserts any such thing that it is cowardly—I trust he will give me five or ten minutes of his time.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I do not mean that assertion with any disrespect to the gentleman from Connecticut. I make it with reference to the action of this House that passed the bill. I stated it on the floor of this House when that commission bill was under discussion, and I repeat it here.

Nor, Mr. Chairman, will I go to the feet of my distinguished colleague [Mr. BROADHEAD], able lawyer as he is, from the State of Missouri, who declared on the floor of this House, in the face of every decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on this subject, that a State has the power to interfere with or regulate interstate commerce?

Mr. BROADHEAD. I never made any such declaration at all.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I do not yield to the gentleman. I will in the course of my argument quote the gentleman's own language, and then will turn to the decision of the Supreme Court and see whether that bears out the assertion.

Mr. Chairman, before I proceed to discuss this bill by sections and to answer some objections that have been urged against it, I desire for the benefit of my Democratic colleagues and friends on this side of the House to state, by reading one or two extracts, what my position is in regard to the constitutional provisions of this bill. The House will bear me witness that when presenting this bill from the Committee on Agriculture I stated frankly and fully that there were grave difficulties in the way of preparing this or any other bill upon this subject; that there were certain powers that belonged to the Federal Government and certain other powers that belonged to the States which had to be utilized and harmonized; and that I was not willing to present a bill to this House, to advocate it, or to vote for it, that infringed upon or impaired the rights of the States as reserved in the Constitution to the States respectively or to the people.

Mr. EATON (in his seat). State rights are not reserved in the Constitution. They belong to the States.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I will not yield now for the interjection of remarks by gentlemen in their seats. The gentleman has had his time, and will have it under the five-minute rule if he desires to reply.

Mr. EATON. I shall desire to do so.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I stated distinctly and emphatically that the power to regulate commerce belongs exclusively to the Federal Government. The condemnation of private property, local quarantine, and the police regulations I stated belonged exclusively to the States, and it was not within the constitutional power of Congress to invade that territory. And I expect to show conclusively to this House and to every member of it who has not made up his mind to vote against the bill, whether it is good or bad, that there is not a single provision in it that infringes either upon the rights of the States or the rights of the Federal Government.

Mr. BROADHEAD. May I ask the gentleman from Missouri a question?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the power to regulate commerce embraces the power to establish police regulations, and whether this is not a police regulation? I never denied the power of the Federal Government to regulate commerce between the States.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I will answer the gentleman very fully. While the gentleman was making his argument he read an extract from the celebrated case of The Railway vs. Husen, which I quoted and referred the House to in my opening remarks; and after he had argued upon a single extract which he read from that decision I asked him this question.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Does the gentleman contend that the States have the power to pass a law which would prohibit the transportation of cattle from one State to another?

Mr. BROADHEAD. Most unquestionably they have, as a police regulation.

Now, what does the Supreme Court in the very case say? Let me read it. The gentleman read a very short extract. If he had read the whole case he would never have made that speech. Here is what the court says:

It seems hardly necessary to argue at length that unless the statute can be justified as a legitimate exercise of the police power of the State it is an usurpation of the power vested exclusively in Congress. It is a plain regulation of interstate commerce, a regulation extending to prohibition. Whatever may be the power of a State over commerce that is completely internal, it can no more prohibit or regulate that which is interstate than it can that which is with foreign nations. Power over one is given by the Constitution of the United States to Congress in the same words in which it is given over the other, and in both cases it is necessarily exclusive. That the transportation of property from one State to another is a branch of interstate commerce is undeniable, and no attempt has been made in this case to deny it.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I ask the gentleman——

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I do not yield. The court goes on to say—

The Missouri statute is a plain interference with such transportation, an attempted exercise over it of the highest possible power—that of destruction.

I know it is hard for gentlemen to keep their seats while I am reading this. Before I get through this argument they may find their seats still hotter for them. The court continues:

It meets at the borders of the State a large and common subject of commerce, and prohibits its crossing the State line during two-thirds of each year, with a proviso, however, that such cattle may come across the line loaded upon a railroad car or steamboat and pass through the State without being unloaded. But even the right of steamboat owners and railroad companies to transport such property through the State is loaded by the law with onerous liabilities because of their agency in the transportation. The object and effect of the statute are, therefore, to obstruct interstate commerce, and to discriminate between the property of citizens of one State and that of citizens of other States. This court has heretofore said that interstate transportation of passengers is beyond the reach of a State Legislature, and if, as we have held, State taxation of persons passing from one State to another, or a State tax upon interstate transportation of passengers, is prohibited by the Constitution because a burden upon it, a fortiori, if possible, is a State tax upon the carriage of merchandise from State to State. Transportation is essential to commerce, or rather it is commerce itself; and every obstacle to it or burden laid upon it by legislative authority is regulation.

And that regulation is declared to be unconstitutional.

Mr. CLAY. Will the gentleman from Missouri permit me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I shall be obliged to the gentleman if he will allow me to proceed with my argument until I get through with this branch of it.

Now, what are the provisions of the bill? I desire to take them up in their order. The first section provides—

That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall organize in his department a bureau of animal industry, and shall appoint a chief thereof, who shall be a competent veterinary surgeon, and whose duty it shall be to investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, &c.

Mr. Chairman, I was not only amused but amazed that gentlemen would spend ten, fifteen, twenty, and thirty minutes in the discussion of this bill, fighting a man of straw that they have erected in that first section, and declaring that the Government of the United States was about to be subverted and the Constitution overridden because it was proposed to organize in the Department of Agriculture a bureau of animal industry. And gentlemen got up and talked about fabulous figures. The idea of making an estimate of the number and value of the domestic animals of the United States! Bless their innocent hearts, the Department of Agriculture has done that work for the last seventeen years. And the object of the section is simply to organize in one bureau the straggling appropriations which have been made in favor of this work from time to time, and is directly in the interest of economy.

I was so much amazed that I asked the Commissioner of Agriculture to send me a statement, in order to test the records of that department. Within twenty-four or forty-eight hours from the time I sent my request to that department I received a communication, accompanied by a table, which I will publish with my remarks, of the States and Territories, giving the number and value of the entire cattle industry of this country. I would not undertake now to read the letter to the House if it was not for the fact that gentlemen do not seem to know what has taken place in that department for the last seventeen years. It is from the "Division of Statistics." I suppose some constitutional lawyer will object to the communication because it comes from the division of statistics in the department of Agriculture, on the ground that this is another infringement of the Constitution, another outrage upon the people of the United States. This is the letter:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
DIVISION OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., February 11, 1884.

SIR: The request of Hon. WILLIAM H. HATCH, chairman of the Committee of Agriculture of the House of Representatives, for the numbers and value of cattle has been referred to this division for reply.

The annual census of farm animals, taken by the corps of department correspondents, is just completed, but not yet published. The results as relate to neat cattle are presented in an accompanying statement, which will not vary materially from the ultimate official publication.

These annual enumerations have been taken by this department for seventeen years, with results more accurate and complete than those obtained from State assessors' returns, and generally approximating the aggregates of the United States census. They are not obtained by an actual count of herds and flocks, a work that would require much time and money, but by careful comparison of increase or decrease, upon known and recorded data, by corps of county correspondents, after much investigation and deliberation.

With increased facilities for the work, the results are gradually attaining greater value and accuracy.

The returns show an increase in milch cows and other cattle, especially of the latter, in the ranges of the great Western plains and mountains.

The average values have also increased; of milch cows from $30.21 to $31.38; of other cattle from $21.80 to $23.52.

The comparison of numbers and values is as follows:

	1883.		1884.
	Number.	Value.	Number.	Value.
Milch cows	13,125,685	$396,557,405	13,495,206	$423,486,649
Other cattle	28,046,077	611,549,109	29,046,101	683,229,054
Total	41,171,762	1,008,106,514	42,541,307	1,106,715 703

This makes the increase in milch cows 269,521, and 1,000,029 in other cattle; and an increase in the aggregate value of all neat stock of $98,609,289.

The number of sheep as recorded will be about 50,000,000. There has been a slight decrease in the farming areas and some increase on the ranches. The pinch in the reduction of prices has been injurious in the principal farming districts, but less severe from the fact that foreign wools have been high the past year. Prices of sheep have declined slightly, the average farm value being $2.37, instead of $2.53 last year, a decline of nearly 7 per cent.

The number of hogs reported is 44,200,893, valued at $246,301,139; an average for all ages of $5.37. The number of the previous estimates was 43,270,086, valued at $291,951,221. Everywhere a decrease in value is reported.

Respectfully,

J. R. DODGE, Statistician.

Hon. GEORGE B. LORING, Commissioner.

I give that to show that this work has been in progress in the Department of Agriculture for seventeen years. Annual appropriations have been made to carry it on, and this section of the pending bill which I have read is intended merely to simplify the work, and is in the interest of economy, proposing to create this bureau of animal industry. Yet my friend from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] and the gentleman from Texas who addressed himself to the House in opposition to this bill [Mr. LANHAM] seemed to think that it would cost millions and millions of dollars for this bureau of animal industry. Indeed, the gentleman went so far as to say that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] ought to support this bill, for it was the surest thing he had seen to unlock the vaults of the Treasury.

I have a word to say to my friend from Texas, and I might as well say it right here. He commenced his remarks on this bill by saying that if he had known the character and provisions of the bill he would have objected to its having consideration in the House. Well, I am very glad my friend did not know it. I am very glad on his account that he did not make any such objection, for before his term expires he will find out and agree with me that about the narrowest statesmanship in this House is that which expends itself in the laconic expression, "I object." [Laughter.]

The gentleman took up some ten or fifteen minutes of his time in glorifying Texas. Why, my friend, I do not yield to any Representative on the floor of this House, even the gentleman from Texas, in my admiration of that great State. I had the honor and the pleasure some years ago of delivering an address at the annual State fair in the city of Houston, in which I spent an hour and a half in telling your people of Texas what an empire you live in. And I appeal to my colleagues and friends on this floor with whom I have served during the past two Congresses if Texas ever had a more ardent and devoted friend outside of her own delegation, whenever she wanted help, than I have proved myself to be. Texas! I admire and love her in her length and her breadth, not only for her magnificent resources but for the grand future that she has before her.

The gentleman from Texas stated the dimensions of the magnificent district which he represents. Let me give the statistics presented by him of the vastness of the area of his district. He said that his district contained more than 120,000 square miles, and was as large as the combined area of ten States named by him. Certainly that does not give to the views of my friend upon this bill any additional weight or influence, because he fails to state the population of that vast territory. Under our system of government people, and not lands or property, are represented in the popular branch of Congress.

Judged by the standard assumed by the gentleman from Texas, what an insignificant constituency the gentleman from New York city [Mr. COX] would represent! Contrast the area of the seventh, eleventh, and eighteenth wards of the city of New York with the district of 120,000 square miles represented by the gentleman from Texas. Yet the gentleman from New York represents a legal and constitutional district, small in territory it is true, but containing the requisite population of the brains and wonderful activity as well as the brawn and muscle of that remarkable cosmopolitan people.

Tried by the standard of the gentleman from Texas, the gentleman from New York would fall far short of a right to a seat on this floor, either in area of land, number or value of cattle, horses, mules, sheep, or swine, and I apprehend in either goats or those long-eared animals classed under the head of "jacks and jennies," of which the gentleman says Texas has 4,756 head, valued at $247,325. And I assume from his argument that his district has its due proportion of them, a proposition which I will not attempt to controvert. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Texas is the most exacting cormorant as to the extent and vastness of his district I have ever heard on this floor. Not satisfied with the claim which I have just briefly noticed, he claims in addition to have many quasi constituents, not only on this floor but in the Senate Chamber, "all the way from New York to Arkansas." "Quasi constituents" is a new element in the representation of a Congressional district. I wonder if it is not unconstitutional? [Laughter.] I commend it to the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] when the next apportionmant bill is presented to Congress.

I am sorry to say that the gentleman in his zeal to defeat this bill criticises in the most offensive manner that portion of it which provides that the chief of this bureau of animal industry shall be a veterinary surgeon. Five or six times in the course of that gentleman's remarks he refers to the head of this bureau as a "horse-doctor;" and that epithet was repeated even by the dignified and courteous gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] and reiterated by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON].

I desire to present to the House for its consideration a short sketch of a few so-called "horse-doctors." This is not the first time that on this floor, when presenting some bill or resolution from the Committee on Agriculture, I have had to meet sneers and jeers and epithets in place of arguments. I have heard gentlemen apply to this bill the terms "granger," "cow bill," and every other epithet that could be invented to injure it. I do not, however, ask any immunity from such treatment. I stand here ready to properly resent such sneers and to defend the committee of which I have the honor to be the chairman, a committee that has intrusted to its charge the interests of that great class who in numbers constitute one-half of the people in this country and who embrace one-half of its wealth. Let gentlemen who wish to defeat a measure which is designed for the benefit of the great agricultural interests of this country try to sneer it down if they choose by calling it a "horse-doctor bill." Who are the "horse-doctors" of this age? I feel assured that the gentleman, if he had read a little recently upon this subject, would not have started out on that line of argument.

Henri Bonley, a veterinarian, and formerly professor at the Alfort Veterinary School, is to-day the leading scientific man of France. He has had every honor accorded to him that a scientific man can hope to obtain. He has been president of the Paris Academy of Medicine and of the Academy of Sciences, and is a member of the French Institute. He was the first, the most able, and the most persistent advocate and exponent of the investigations and discoveries of Pasteur. And although he took up the contest in the Academy of Medicine almost single-handed against the leading scientists of France, he has been uniformly successful, is looked upon as the most powerful debater and writer of the day, and within a few years has produced a revolution in the medical views of his country so far as concerns the subject of contagious diseases. He has lately attracted much attention as the advocate of the free admission of American pork, and is doing more than almost any one else to show the frivolous character of the objections that have been brought against it.

Professor Chaureau, director of the Veterinary School of Lyons, a life-long veterinarian, is the most accomplished anatomist, physiologist, and investigator of the time. His work on the anatomy of domestic animals is used the world over, not only by veterinarians but by scientific naturalists. He was the first to demonstrate that contagious diseases are caused by living germs; in this he leads Pasteur and Koch by several years. He has made more original investigations and more important discoveries than any man who has ever worked with contagious diseases, and it is conceded by all that he has no peer for the clearness with which he marks out his lines of research and the satisfactory and convincing character of his experiments.

Professor Colin, of the Veterinary School of Alfort, is one of the most eminent physiologists, and is author of a work on animal physiology which is used and quoted wherever science is studied.

Arloing, Cornevin, and Thomas, three young veterinarians, associated themselves together a few years ago to study the disease known in this country as black-quarter, a very destructive malady of young cattle. They discovered the germ which causes the disease, learned the drugs and chemicals most fatal to it, and succeeded in preventing it by a peculiar method of vaccination. Their whole study of the nature and character of the disease is remarkable for its ability and success. Such a thorough and scientific investigation of a contagious disease has never been made in all the history of human medicine.

Professor Toussaint, of Toulouse, has the reputation of being the most brilliant of the young scientific men of France. He discovered the germ of fowl cholera, which enabled Pasteur to make his world-renowned discovery in regard to vaccination for animal diseases. He also originated the method of attenuating or weakening a virus by heat, so that it could be used for preventing the disease by vaccination.

Besides these, the names of Méguin, Leblanc, Degive, Frasbol, Magne, Zundel, Lafosse, Delafond, Nocard, and many others are known not only as veterinarians but as scientists and authorities on the great medical questions of the day.

In Germany and Austria the names of Roloff, Spinola, Johne, Franck, Hering, Hertwig, Röll, Feser, Schmidt, Adam, Harms, and Wehenkel are as well known as scientists as they are as veterinarians.

In England, Fleming has made a reputation by his veterinary writings, which makes his name familiar to every student of medical science. It is often remarked by leading physicians that the medical profession has nothing that can be compared to the two volumes of Fleming's on the Origin, History, and Prevention of Animal Plagues. His Manual of Veterinary Sanitary Science and Police and other special works are equal either from a literary, scientific, or practical standpoint to the best that the members of any profession have ever produced.

Williams, Walley, Robertson, Brown, Steele, and Axe are all acknowledged to be scientific and very able men.

Besides the veterinarians mentioned above many physicians and scientists have made their reputations by studying the diseases of animals. Among these are Pasteur, Koch, Klebs, Bollinger, Burdon-Sanderson, and Klein.

Coming to America, we find that in spite of the admitted fact that the most destructive diseases of people can never be thoroughly understood until more is known of the diseases of animals; in spite of the annual loss of more than $50,000,000 from preventible diseases among animals in the United States, the veterinary profession has been held in the back-ground, discouraged and sneered at by those who should have assisted and defended it. Even in the Congress of the United States, which is supposed to represent the intelligence and the most progressive sentiment of the country, such terms of reproach and scorn as "horse-doctor" and "scientific cranks" are hurled at those who are trying to prevent these enormous losses from falling on the live-stock industry and to assist in throwing light on the most destructive plagues of the human race.

A few men have been brave enough to face the sneers and derision and the loss of social position which in the early days of the profession were about the only rewards which they received for a life-long devotion to the interests of their country and to the cause of humanity. The American veterinary profession, though fewer in numbers, begins to rank in ability and scientific attainments with any in the world.

Professor James Law, of Cornell University, a native of Scotland, and educated in the best schools of Europe, was selected because of his great attainments to head the veterinary department of Cornell University, and has been one of the best known professors of that institution since 1868. In 1870, when the dreaded foot-and-mouth disease was introduced into the State of New York, and when the cattle interests of that great State were threatened with the most terrible losses, all were but too glad to seek information from this veterinarian. Again, when in 1878 Congress made its first appropriation for investigating the destructive diseases of swine which were discouraging the farmers over vast sections of the country, Professor Law was called upon to mark out an intelligent line of investigation. In 1879 the veterinary direction of the work for stamping out pleuro-pneumonia in New York was placed in his hands, and after clearing the greater part of the infected district in that State of the disease he was obliged to stop for want of funds.

Professor A. Liantard, a native of France, is well known as the head of the American Veterinary College in New York, and is an eminent scientific man.

Dr. Charles P. Lyman, formerly veterinarian of the Department of Agriculture, has been selected by Harvard University as a proper person to organize a veterinary department in that institution.

Dr. R. S. Huidekoper is another well-educated veterinarian selected by the University of Pennsylvania to organize a veterinary department in that institution.

Dr. Salmon, the present veterinarian of the Department of Agriculture, is a graduate of Cornell University. He studied also at the leading veterinary school in France, and has long been widely known in this country as a correspondent of our leading agricultural journals and as one of the very few men in the world who have successfully investigated contagious diseases.

Besides these there are a considerable number of educated and practical veterinarians in this country who have been of great value to the owners of domestic animals.

It is true the profession is still small, but it is rapidly growing; it has fought its way against every obstacle and discouragement; its members have sought education and knowledge in every department of science and in every language where assistance was to be found; and the appreciation of its usefulness, beginning with the masses, has permeated all classes of our society, until praise and favor have taken the place of contumely everywhere with the single exception of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Dr. Salmon, the present veterinarian of the Department of Agriculture, whose exhaustive report is embodied in the report made by the Committee on Agriculture accompanying this bill, contains the latest information on the subject of pleuro-pneumonia, its existence and spread in the United States. That paper is published in the RECORD, and as an exhibition of scientific knowledge and research as well as literary composition, will compare favorably with the effort of any gentleman who has spoken for or against this bill.

But gentlemen say that they can not support the bill because of the latter clause of section 1:

The Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ a force sufficient for this purpose.

My friend from Missouri [Mr. BROADHEAD] grows eloquent in his opposition to this provision, and makes an appeal to the Democratic side of the House to defeat this bill unless we want to put in the field an unlimited number of political canvassers and all that sort of thing. Sir, I had hoped that it was possible to introduce in this House a bill from the Committee on Agriculture affecting alone the industrial and material interests of the country that could be discussed without resort to partisan appeals. I am about as strong a partisan, I take it when the occasion requires it, as any man on this floor or off of it.

A MEMBER. As strong as there is any use for.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Yes, as strong as there is any use for; but I do not believe, and have never advocated the idea, that all the patriotism, all the intelligence, all the virtue of this country is in any one political organization. I am not governed and guided in my action on this floor by any such sentiment as that.

But my friend will allow me to say to him—I digress just long enough for this remark, and then I am done with partyism in this discussion—let me say to the gentleman that the Democratic party is not in any danger from the appointment of a few colporteurs or agents who may be put out under this or any other bill. That is not what is the matter with the Democratic party, if you have any fear about its future. What the Democratic party wants to-day is funerals—funerals in Massachusetts, funerals in New York, funerals in Indiana, funerals in Ohio——

Mr. GEDDES. Oh, no! [Laughter.]

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Yes, sir; funerals in Ohio, and lots of them—great big ones. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. WELLER. Do not give us any in Iowa, if you please.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. We want to bury a few of the barnacles and corpses that have been hanging onto the party——

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I do not yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri declines to be interrupted.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. We had a national Democratic committee in session here a few days ago, and the majority of that committee did not have originality or independence enough to find a place in the United States to hold their convention outside of where the Republicans are to hold theirs. [Laughter.] I tell my Democratic friends that for one I have followed long enough in the wake of these old barnacles; I have followed their lead in the wake of the Republican party long enough. [Voices on the Republican side: "Keep on!"] I want a little more new blood in the Democratic party; I want a little nerve in it; I want a little independence in it; I want a little originality in it. Before I would have followed the Republican party to Chicago to hold a national convention I would have gone to Los Angeles, or Kennebunk, Me. I would have gone where the thermometer registers 200° below zero or 400° above the boiling point. [Laughter.] I would have independence enough to strike out for once on our own hook. This lack of independence and courage is the only thing I am afraid of in the management of the Democratic party.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I see that the Republican party are supporting this bill with a great deal of alacrity.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Yes; and in that respect they are following the lead of a Democratic committee of the House. But I am not talking about the bill now. [Laughter.] I am answering the gentleman from Missouri. His argument in this respect had nothing to do with the bill, and I am simply replying to a partisan appeal that ought never to have been introduced into this discussion. But I accept his gauntlet all the way through, and I do not propose to be deterred from answering either legitimate or illegitimate arguments on this bill.

You can not get up a measure here to save your life. I defy the intelligence of this House to introduce a measure into this Congress that has for its object the promotion of the agricultural interests of this country, and which seeks in the slightest degree, ay, in the most minute degree, to interfere with the operations of these gigantic and almost monarchical corporations which control the transportation of the Union, but some Democrat will get qualms of conscience and jump it, to use a homely phrase, quicker than a duck will a June-bug. [Laughter and applause.] They will jump it in an instant, Mr. Chairman. They will say it is an infraction of the Constitution. Yes, sir; if we could throw a little new life into the Democratic party we would soon be on our way to the establishment of better laws. [Applause on the Republican side.]

A MEMBER. You get your applause on the other side.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. My friend, whenever I say a thing that is true I am not particular where the applause comes from. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am not altogether dependent on applause. [Applause.] I am not seeking applause, except it be the applause of the Committee on Agriculture, which I have the honor to represent upon this floor, and the applause of the constituency who have honored me, whom I regard more than I do the applause of the constitutional lawyers of this House. [Applause on the Republican side.] I desire simply to do my duty in connection with this pending measure.

But to come back to the objection that this bill provides for a large number of office-holders. I will remove that objection, as I do not wish my friend from Missouri or anybody else to think the Commissioner of Agriculture is going to appoint 100,000 employés under the provisions of this bill. Therefore, by authority of the Committee on Agriculture, I propose to add at the end "not to exceed twenty persons at any one time." How does that strike you? [Laughter and applause.] I propose to limit the number to twenty; that instead of 200,000 no more than twenty persons shall be employed at any one time.

Mr. STORM. Why did you not think of that before you brought the bill in?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. We did think of it. The committee discussed it, and we acted upon information from the Commissioner of Agriculture. We acted upon the very best advice in limiting the amount of money as well as the number of persons to what would be absolutely necessary to execute the provisions of the bill. We never supposed any gentleman on the floor of this House, or anywhere else, would believe that under the operations of the bill 200,000 employés, or any extravagant or unnecessary number, would be employed to carry out in good faith its provisions.

In the second section of the bill we provide for the appointment of two competent men who shall be practical stock-raisers. My friend from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] objects to that because these two are to be added to the large number of office-holders already under the Government. I can not quote his exact language, but that was the substance of his criticism. Now, gentlemen, do you never expect that the Democratic party will come into power in this Government? You have not half the faith I have, or you would not be so anxious to cut off these office-holders necessary to the execution of an important measure. In my judgment the Democratic party will be in power in this country after March, 1885.

Mr. HORR. What sort of civil-service reform is that you are going to establish?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Yes, sir; I say that after March, 1885, the Democratic party will come into power in this country, and that of itself will be civil-service reform.

Now, I come to some of the provisions of the bill about which there may well be differences of opinion. The fourth section of the bill contains the following provision:

SEC. 4. That whenever a State or Territory, in any section of which a contagious or infectious disease exists which the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation, fails to make provisions for its extirpation, or to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the extirpation of such disease, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare in quarantine the said State or Territory, or such part of said State or Territory as he may deem dangerous to the animal industries of the country, and to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district.

It has been suggested to me that the committee has not used language broad or explicit enough to prevent cavil as to its interpretation, but the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has suggested an amendment which meets with the approval of the committee, to add at the end of the last line the words "into any other State, or Territory, or foreign country," so that there can be no question about its purport and meaning. In explanation and vindication of this section I expected to read a few extracts, but I have not time, and will ask leave of the House to print them.

But I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, to my distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] that I agree with Judge Story in his interpretation of that first clause of the eighth section of the Constitution which gives to the Congress of the United States the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; that it is a limited power, that it limits the power of the Government to certain specified purposes of taxation. And that is the reason I cannot agree with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] and his school on the tariff question.

Mr. EATON. You do agree.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I do not.

Mr. EATON. I agree with you, and you can not help it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I did not agree with the gentleman from Connecticut in his tariff commission.

Mr. EATON. Every Democrat in the Senate voted for it, and every Republican in the Senate voted for it.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I have never had the honor or pleasure of serving in the Senate. I serve in a higher body; one that directly represents the people of the country.

Mr. EATON. So do I.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I am glad to know that the gentleman does now. I do not care if every Democratic Senator did vote for it; I know it to be a fact that every Democratic Representative did not vote for it.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not find any warrant in the Constitution to levy a tax or so frame the tariff laws of the country as to protect one of our important industries at the expense of fifty millions of the people.

Mr. EATON. That is altogether another matter from the commission. I should be glad if the gentleman would allow me five or ten minutes.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I will when I get through.

Mr. EATON. Ah! but I want it here.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. The gentleman has had his time and will have another opportunity.

Mr. EATON. But I want the gentleman, while he is discussing this question, to understand, if he can, the difference between the organization of a commission formed for the only purpose of bringing information and the two Houses of Congress acting under their powers for the passage of a law. The gentleman does not seem to appreciate the difference.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I heard all of that discussed over and over again. I heard the arguments pro and con in this House when that matter was under consideration, and it only confirmed me the more in the invulnerability of the position occupied by myself and my associate Democrats on this floor, that it was a surrender of the privileges and the prerogatives of the members of this House.

Mr. EATON. To learn!

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Yes, sir; to learn in that way.

Mr. EATON. To be taught!

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Yes; to be taught in such a way as that. Gentlemen are expected to know something when they come here about such matters; and if they do not, then let them go to the library and get such information as is open to any man who chooses to search for it, and not go hunting about the country for it with a patent commission. [Laughter.]

Mr. EATON. They ought to know something, that is certain.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. As before stated, I agree with Judge Story in his explanation and interpretation of the eighth section when he says:

"The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," in order "to pay the debts and to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

That is, for the purpose of paying the public debts and providing for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

In this sense Congress has not an unlimited power of taxation; but it is limited to specific objects—the payment of the public debts and providing for the common defense and general welfare.—Commentaries on the Constitution, volume 2, section 905, page 368.

But then it is said, if Congress may lay taxes for the common defense and general welfare, the money may be appropriated for those purposes, although not within the scope of the other enumerated powers. Certainly it may be so appropriated; for if Congress is authorized to lay taxes for such purposes, it would be strange if, when raised, the money could not be applied to them. That would be to give a power for a certain end and then deny the end intended by the power.—Ibid., section 920, pages 383, 384.

Mr. Pomeroy, in his treatise on constitutional law, says:

The subsection should, therefore, be understood as though it read, taxes may be laid and collected in order to pay debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare. Thus the Congress does not possess an absolutely unlimited power of taxation. It can only resort to this high attribute for one or more of three purposes—payment of debts, the common defense, the general welfare. The defense must be common and the welfare general. But, after all, this leaves a sufficiently wide field for the legislative operations. Money may be raised to pay any debts, however contracted, whether now existing or to become due at a future time. Common defense and general welfare are terms of the broadest generality; and within them can be easily included all the objects for which governments may legitimately provide. (Page 175, section 274.)

Certainly the objects and purposes of this bill are sufficiently important and general to justify the appropriation of money by the General Government. I have heard no argument to convince me to the contrary.

But some of my Democratic friends say they can not support the bill because it gives the President of the United States power to declare a State in quarantine. Upon what condition of things is he authorized to do so? After the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared that a certain State or a district in a State contains within its limits a contagious and infectious disease dangerous to the animal industry of the country, then upon that representation the President of the United States—amenable to the people for his acts, occupying this high position—shall, in his discretion, declare that State or part of a State in quarantine and prevent the exportation of diseased cattle from that State to another. But yet gentlemen say this is unconstitutional! The same power was conferred upon the President in the act entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States," approved June 2, 1879, the third section of which is as follows:

SEC. 3. That the National Board of Health shall co-operate with and, so far as it lawfully may, aid State and municipal boards of health in the execution and enforcement of the rules and regulations of such boards to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States from foreign countries, and into one State from another, and at such ports and places within the United States as have no quarantine regulations under State authority where such regulations are, in the opinion of the National Board of Health, necessary to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States from foreign countries, or into one State from another; and at such ports and places within the United States where quarantine regulations exist under the authority of the State, which, in the opinion of the National Board of Health, are not sufficient to prevent the introduction of such diseases into the United States, or into one State from another, the National Board of Health shall report the facts to the President of the United States, who shall, if, in his judgment, it is necessary and proper, order said board of health to make such additional rules and regulations as are necessary to prevent the introduction of such diseases into the United States from foreign countries, or into one State from another, which, when so made and approved by the President, shall be promulgated by the National Board of Health and enforced by the sanitary authorities of the States where the State authorities will undertake to execute and enforce them; but if the State authorities shall fail or refuse to enforce said rules and regulations the President may detail an officer or appoint a proper person for that purpose.

Under this act $500,000 was appropriated.

I do not intend that any gentleman on this side of the House shall have a reasonable excuse for voting against this bill if I can avoid it. At the earnest solicitation of gentlemen who desire to vote for the bill I will at the proper time offer an amendment to that section for the consideration of the House. I will do so because I believe in the fairness and justness of it and because I believe that the Federal Government and the States will act in a spirit of harmony to stamp out this terrible disease.

I purpose to offer, and I would like my friends to hear me, this provision:

The President of the United States, on the presentation of facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture—

Now mark you—

and with the consent and approbation of the governor of such State, shall declare it in quarantine, &c.

There is no infraction in this. There will be no trouble about the concert of action between the different States and the Federal Government on the subject.

Mr. GIBSON. Was that in the bill which was read to the House and submitted for our discussion?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I say that I will offer that as an amendment from my committee, sir.

Mr. EATON. I hope that you will be kind enough to tell this House at the same time, and before you get through, what right a governor of a State has to agree to any such provision as that? Under what authority can he exercise this power?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Under the authority that may be conferred upon him by the Legislature of the State. We expect to induce the States to legislate upon this subject. I do not think it would be in my power, or that of the Committee on Agriculture, or of anybody else on the floor of this House, to so prepare this bill as that the gentleman from Connecticut would be satisfied with it or certain other gentlemen. I am satisfied his objections are so radical to the bill that I could not satisfy him; but I am trying to satisfy reasonable gentlemen who have made reasonable objections to the bill.

Now, my friend from Missouri, my distinguished colleague [Mr. BROADHEAD], I am proud to say to this House and the members who do not know him as well as I—for I have known him and loved him for twenty-five or thirty years—stands at the very head of the bar of our State. He is known and recognized as one of the most thorough lawyers not only in Missouri but throughout the Mississippi Valley and is devoted to his profession and to his library, and looks at this bill through the spectacles merely of a lawyer. Why, it is known all over Missouri that my friend has been so devoted to his profession for thirty years that he could hardly tell a horse from a cow except by the horns. [Laughter.] He knows nothing whatever of animals, and is not, certainly, competent to decide on the question relating to animal industry. He gets up here and reads the opinion of a solitary veterinary surgeon somewhere in Philadelphia, that he admits he never heard of before, and upon the strength of his statement urges his objections to this measure in the House. He does that notwithstanding the strong argument that has been made in support of such a measure by the Representatives of twenty-seven of the States in the national convention of cattle breeders and others held at Chicago; by resolutions of a dozen or more States of this Union; by every single agricultural commission that has met in the United States to consider this subject within the past five years; by the last assembly of the National Grange of the United States—all of them live farmers, representing the agricultural interests of the country. They are a set of ignoramuses, who know nothing whatever about the matter when placed in opposition to a letter that my friend quotes from this veterinary surgeon in Philadelphia.

Why, sir, this matter has been under discussion in this House since the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress. We have had men here representing millions of money invested in the cattle industry. Men came into that committee-room and begged us to appropriate $500,000 or $1,000,000, and said if necessary they would be willing to be taxed so much per head upon their cattle to pay this appropriation rather than to see this bill fail. They have stood here for years and knocked at the door of Congress, and beg us to do something to stop this disease from extending from the Eastern States, where it now exists, to the great States of the West.

And yet Texas opposes this bill. I know very well why they oppose it. They are afraid under the provisions of this bill some time or other science may find out how the Texas or Spanish fever is communicated from the native cattle of Texas to the cattle of Illinois and other Western States; and they are afraid their State will be quarantined. For five years a member of the Committee on Agriculture, I have fought your battle to keep out by name the Spanish and Texas fever from this and similar bills, because I happened to know by actual professional and practical experience that we had never been able to find out the link by which the disease is communicated from the Texas cattle to ours. And, therefore, all the litigation in reference to the effects of Spanish or Texas fever has failed. Not a single suit in the State of Missouri has been successfully prosecuted or a single dollar of damages recovered where thousands and millions of property have been destroyed.

We bring in this bill, therefore, which prevents the exportation of cattle from a State or district where a contagious infection or communicable disease exists. That is said to be unconstitutional. Yet the Supreme Court says it is alone within the power of Congress to provide for interstate commerce and the rules and regulations that shall govern it. And I desire to say this: Every single veterinarian in the United States who has appeared before the Committee on Agriculture, in answer to a question which I propounded to him, said to us, "If you can prevent the transportation of cattle affected by pluro-pneumonia from one State to another, New York can in one single year eradicate it, New Jersey can eradicate it from her borders, and Maryland from hers." The trouble is, the very moment some of the dairymen in large cities like Brooklyn, Philadelphia, and Baltimore find the disease has broken out in their herds the cattle are sent over to adjacent States and the disease crosses the border. We simply want to make it a misdemeanor under proper rules and regulations for cattle affected by contagious and to innocent purchasers and carried or driven on foot from one State to infectious disease to be transported from one State to another, or sold another.

Now, what have we done in this bill to offend the railroads or transportation interests of this country? It is an open secret that some of the transportation lines and railroad companies are opposed to this bill, and boasts have been made within the Halls of this Capitol within the last twenty-four hours that it should be defeated, because we have provided that it shall be a misdemeanor for any person, agent, railroad corporation, or anybody else to transport diseased cattle from one State to another. But we have gone so far as to provide in regard to railroad companies—

That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to notify in writing the proper officials or agents of any railroad, steamboat, or other transportation company doing business in or through any infected locality, and by publication in such newspapers, &c.

We have taken every precaution known to prudence not to interfere with the transportation or to make any man or any company amenable to the provisions of this bill until he has had ample notice that a contagious disease existed in the district and that it had been put in quarantine. Why should not this restriction be put upon these persons and corporations? Certainly they have got power enough to stand this reasonable regulation in the interest of the great cattle industry of the country; certainly they have power enough to stand this little restriction in the interest of the people of the United States whose lives, as science tells us, are this day in danger by the spread of this disease.

Gentlemen say the disease has existed on the eastern slope of the Alleghanies for many years and has never got one hundred miles west of the seaboard. That is true. But does not every man of information know that the great lines of travel are from the East to the West, and not from the West to the East?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DIBRELL. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Missouri be extended.

Mr. WELLER. I would suggest that it seems to me to be fair, if the time of the gentleman from Missouri be extended, a similar time be allowed to the opponents of the bill as it now stands.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I do not desire an extension of time on any such terms. I did not intend to occupy more than five or six minutes more. The opponents of the bill have already had more time than its friends.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] that the time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I am profoundly obliged to the House for its indulgence. If I had consulted my own feelings in this matter I would have yielded this discussion to any gentleman who desired to take it. But my duty to my committee and myself and the character of the attacks which have been made on this bill have made it necessary for me to go into it at length. I hold in my hand the report of the Treasury Cattle Commission on the disease of lung-fever or pleuro-pneumonia. It has astonished me that gentlemen urged objections to this bill as if this were a brand-new proposition that had been brought into the House of Representatives now for the first time. Why, sir, for the last seven years we have been making appropriations and the Department of Agriculture with its veterinary surgeons have been making these investigations and reports. Here is the report of the Treasury Cattle Commission. I do not know whether my distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] while in the Senate voted for this commission or not, but I know it passed both the Senate and the House, and it has been the law. An appropriation was made under that law, and there is a great deal of information in that report.

I will read one short extract from it. Some gentlemen in the House have been disposed to make light of this disease. I know there are a number of gentlemen here who do not believe that anything like pleuro-pneumonia in cattle ever existed. I have heard it stated on the floor of this House that there is no such disease in the country. Let me read a short extract from this report to show the fate that awaits Texas and New Mexico, Arizona and Montana, and all the feeding grounds of the Northwest if this disease ever gets a foothold there: "An act of the Victorian legislature"—this was in Australia, where certainly the feeding grounds and the climatic influences are just as propitious as they are in Texas:

An act of the Victorian legislature, passed March 19, 1861, provided for an inspection of all cattle in suspected districts, the slaughter of the sick, and the interdiction of movement; and as the disease had now appeared at the Ovens, on the borders of New South Wales, the legislature of that colony passed a similar act April 11, 1861. An attempt was made by the latter colony to keep the disease south of Murray River, but the golden opportunity had been neglected; the disease, carried by working and stray cattle, had been introduced into many of the large herds roaming the open country, and throughout 1861 the commissioners found the malady wherever they went in both colonies. The first cases observed in New South Wales were in a large herd at Yarra Yarra, which had been moved by its owners, Messrs. McLaurin, from Mitta Mitta, Victoria, in August, 1861. Yet in January, 1862, the New South Wales commissioners report that they had examined 100,000, and in every herd, with one or two exceptions, they had found the disease. In Victoria matters were worse if possible, and by midsummer 1862 it is reported that in that colony "whole hecatombs of infected and suspected cattle have been burned and destroyed." It is estimated that up to 1873 1,404,097, or 40 per cent. of the cattle of the island, perished, amounting, at $30 per head, to a total value of $43,500,000. And still it prevails with unabated fury, standing, with the infected unfenced ranges of South Africa, Europe, and Asia, as a solemn warning of our own impending fate should we, too, delay till the infection shall reach our Western plains and Territories.

There is another provision in this bill which I desire to explain briefly to the Committee of the Whole and to give the reasons of the Committee of Agriculture for inserting it. I refer to the proviso of the third section. That section provides that "whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any State or Territory in which pleuro-pneumonia or other contagious, infectious, or communicable disease is declared to exist," &c.

That is objected to by some of the opponents of this bill. They complain that it places in the hands of the Commissioner of Agriculture legislative action. Sir, there has been scarcely a day, certainly not a week, since I have been in Congress that Congress has not enacted some law giving to the heads of the different Departments of the Government power to make certain rules and regulations to carry out some law. The only object of this provision is to secure some uniform system by which this disease can be attacked.

Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any State or Territory in which pleuro-pneumonia or other contagious, infectious, or communicable disease is declared to exist, and whenever the governor of a State or other properly constituted authorities signify their readiness to co-operate for the extinction of any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease in conformity with the provisions of this act, the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations, in paying for the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and in such disinfection and other means that may be necessary to extirpate the disease.

Now mark the proviso:

Provided, That the authorities of said State or Territory shall assume and pay one-half of the expense of the valuation of the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and one-half the cost of disinfection and necessary police regulations in the quarantine and care of infected herds of cattle.

Mr. BELFORD. I want to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I do not hear one word the gentleman says.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] requests permission to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] a question.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. BELFORD. I want to know of the gentleman whether this third section of the bill (I have endeavored to read it carefully) does not place in the hands of the Commissioner of Agriculture, or the agents to be appointed by him, the power, without any notification whatever to the owner of any cattle, to determine the whole question of the existence of the disease, and to kill his entire herd, upon ex parte information and without any proper examination?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. There the gentleman goes off on his scientific cranks again. [Laughter.] I thought he had done with that part of the subject.

In answer to the gentleman, I will say without any hesitation that it gives no such power. The purpose of that proviso is to place the police regulations and the matter of the destruction of property under the control and care of the State, where it belongs, the Government of the United States simply stepping in and saying to the State of Connecticut, for instance, "If you will do this we will aid you to the extent of one-half of the value of the cattle destroyed or of the expense the State may be to carry out the purpose of this law."

I say again that if any gentleman will take that proviso and frame an amendment to it which will more clearly place that matter exclusively in the hands of the State authorities I will thank him to do so and will accept it in behalf of the committee, for that is the purpose of the bill. The right to prevent the transportation of diseased cattle from one State to another rests with the Federal Government. I distinctly stated in the opening of my remarks that all police regulations, the power of condemnation of property, and the right to establish local quarantine, rested alone with the State. All that this bill seeks to do is to aid the State in stamping out this disease.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] in his first remarks upon this bill stated that New York did not want any assistance in this matter. Yet we have received here resolutions from the Legislature of New York. We have had before our committee the largest delegation from New York of any State begging and imploring the Committee on Agriculture to report this bill at once and press it to a conclusion in the House.

I desire to say to the Committee of the Whole that there is not in a single provision of this bill, so far as the Committee on Agriculture have had any purpose in its framing, a disposition to trespass on the rights of the States, or to do anything except to aid the States in extinguishing and extirpating this disease. If the bill can be so amended in Committee of the Whole as the better to secure that object, I will make no opposition to any such amendment that may be offered.

I have now to the best of my ability discharged my duty in closing this general debate and in presenting to this House the views of the Committee on Agriculture. I ask for this bill only a fair, candid, and calm examination in connection with the facts which the committee have submitted in their report. If, after such an examination, any gentleman feels that it is his duty under any provision of the Constitution to vote against it, it is his right, his privilege, and his duty to do so.

Mr. Chairman, I am profoundly obliged to the committee for its indulgence in extending my time. I now call for the reading of the bill by sections for consideration and amendment under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GIBSON. Before the gentleman does that, will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON. The question is this: If this bill shall be recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture, can not that committee strike out some of the clauses which have been objected to, and report a bill back covering the whole object which the gentleman now claims that the committee desire?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I will say in reply that I think the Committee of the Whole can perfect this bill just as well as the Committee on Agriculture. I can see no reason in the world why the bill should be recommitted. In the whole argument of this question, from the beginning down to this moment, not a dozen lines of this bill have been pointed out as objectionable to any gentleman on this floor. It is true that some gentlemen have said that the whole bill is objectionable. But I will say that gentlemen who have criticised the framing of this bill have referred to only two portions of it as objectionable—the one providing for the quarantine and the other regulating the transportation of diseased cattle from one State to another.

This bill is, in the judgment of the Committee on Agriculture, the very best that can be framed; and while I will not violate the proprieties of this floor by stating what has been done elsewhere, it is certainly no discourtesy to say that a similar bill in every single provision has been reported from the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate and is now pending in that body. Both branches of Congress are entreated by the cattle interests of the country to come to a speedy conclusion upon this subject.

Mr. WELLER. As a member of the Committee on Agriculture I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Very well.

Mr. WELLER. Is it not fair to presume that by the discussion on this floor the Committee on Agriculture have been informed in many particulars in reference to this bill beyond what they knew before; and being thus informed, is it not fair to presume that the committee, if this bill were recommitted to them, would be able to eliminate the objectionable features?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Well, the gentleman can answer that question for himself. If he has had any new light upon it, it is all right for him. I have no authority to answer the question for any other member of the committee than myself; but, so far as I am concerned, I am very frank to say that I have seen no new light, and no reason has been presented to me why I should change my position upon the question.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to ask the gentleman further, whether he has not himself, in the presence of the House, offered amendments to the bill?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I have; and the gentleman knows it was done in pursuance of authority conferred upon me by the committee.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate has expired, and the regular order being called for, the Clerk will now report the bill by sections for amendment and discussion under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall organize in his Department a bureau of animal industry, and shall appoint a chief thereof, who shall be a competent veterinary surgeon, and whose duty it shall be to investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use, and also inquire into and report the causes of contagious and communicable diseases among them, and the means for the prevention and cure of the same, and to collect such information on these subjects as shall be valuable to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country; and the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ a force sufficient for this purpose. The salary of the chief of said bureau shall be $3,000 per annum; and the Commissioner shall appoint a clerk for said bureau, with a salary of $1,500 per annum.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment already pending to this section—an amendment recommended by the Committee on Agriculture. It will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "contagious," in line 9, insert the word "infectious."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. On behalf of the committee I move to amend by inserting after the word "purpose," at the end of the fourteenth line, the words "not to exceed twenty persons at any one time."

Mr. EATON. Is this amendment debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is debatable under the five-minute rule.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. As a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 1 strike out all after the word "country," in the thirteenth line, to the end of line 14.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment be adopted, it will strike out these words: "And the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ a force sufficient for this purpose." The gentleman from Missouri has moved to insert after these words this language: "Not to exceed twenty persons at any one time." It will be seen that my amendment is in the nature of a substitute for that of the gentleman from Missouri. If my amendment be adopted, it will very properly remove from the bill the authority proposed to be given to the Commissioner of Agriculture to "employ a force sufficient for this purpose," or, as suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, a force of twenty persons.

Mr. CALKINS. I rise to a parliamentary question. Is it not first in order to perfect the section before entertaining a motion to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the vote will first be upon the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, the committee having a right to perfect their bill before a motion to strike out is entertained. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON. Whereabouts in this bill is it provided what compensation shall be paid to these twenty men? Is there anything in the bill?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. There is a provision in the bill for compensation of $10 a day and for the payment of necessary expenses.

Mr. GIBSON. That only goes to the two agents which are provided for, but I am speaking of the twenty men you propose to employ in addition to the two agents. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that there is no provision made to pay these twenty men. My objection is not to defeat any proper bill, but to make a suggestion so that the provisions of the bill may be perfected.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. If, as we progress in the consideration of the bill, we find no provision is made for compensation, I will bring in an amendment to cover it.

Mr. GIBSON. It is not provided for in the bill now.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. We can provide for it hereafter.

The amendment of Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON].

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. If that amendment be adopted it will leave the Commissioner of Agriculture without any force to carry out the provisions of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 75.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to strike out the last word; and I hope, Mr. Chairman, I may have the attention of the House, for this is, in my judgment, the most important bill, and the most dangerous in another sense, we have had before the House for a great many years. As I stated a few days ago, we shipped in 1872 from this country to England live-stock to the amount of $565,000. Nine years after that we shipped to Europe live-stock to the value of $14,304,103. In 1872 we shipped to Europe sheep of the value of $79,000. In 1881 we had increased that exportation to the amount of $762,932. So that the transportation of our domestic animals to Europe is constantly increasing, and therefore a bill that affects us in so many vital ways as this should receive the mature judgment of this House.

I am in favor of passing a bill to prevent pleuro-pneumonia from extending over this country; but, according to the report of the Treasury commissioner, we have got no pleuro-pneumonia in the South, we have none in the West, none in New England, but, as I said the other day, it is located in Rhode Island, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and New York; but still, to prevent its spread, we should adopt some wise and judicious legislation. But I say this bill, as it is framed, places the $2,000,000,000 of money invested in sheep and cattle and hogs in the hands of a commissioner appointed by the Agricultural Department. And nowhere does this bill provide even the manner in which the inspection of cattle is to be made. A man can go out to my ranch at the bidding of some man, and while I am sitting in my office, without notifying me, destroy my cattle. And that is the character of the bill.

I assert, sir, that the National Government should take care of this question. In Illinois pork is inspected for foreign transportation. When it reaches New York the officers of that State assume the right to reinspect. Will not this course lead to a conflict between the States? Where such vast interests are at stake is it not well for us to place the regulation of this matter under the control of the Federal Government? We have been talking about cattle. Let me call your attention to some facts bearing on disease in another great industry, namely, swine. Thousands of families are poisoned by diseased pork in this country and Europe. The food we eat should be a matter of great concern, and especially so when that food enters into our commerce. I desire to make a few remarks on the question of diseases that affect our swine.

Congress some years ago, having appropriated the sum of $10,000 for defraying the expenses of a commission to investigate and determine the causes producing and, if possible, discover remedies for the diseases of hogs and the other domesticated animals, Drs. Law, Detmers, and Salmon were specially appointed on such commission, with special authority to confine their experiments to the former animal and report on same.

Dr. James Law sent in his first report from Ithaca, N. Y., under date of January 2, 1879.

As this report was simply preparatory to his elaborate subsequent investigations on the subject, it can be dismissed in a few words.

He discovered at the outset of his course of investigation that the freezing of the virulent matter did not destroy its activity; also that the period of incubation was from three to seven days after inoculation. This differed somewhat from the experience of others. Dr. Sutton set the period from thirteen to fourteen days, Professor Axe from five to eight days, Dr. Budd from four to five days, and Professor Osler from four to six days. Dr. Detmers, as will be observed in his report, to be made part of this résumé, gives the period of incubation from five to fifteen days. As this difference covers investigations in all parts of the globe, a mean average can be struck easily.

Dr. James Law made a second report, dated Ithaca, N. Y., June 10, 1880, covering the time subsequent to his first report to the latter date, and which is mostly devoted to important experiments for the purpose of determining the susceptibility of other animals to swine-plague.

These experiments resulted, as he had previously foreshadowed, in the successful inoculation of sheep and rats, and in the transmission of the disease from these animals back to swine in a more virulent and intensified form.

He experimented with this result on lambs, sheep, and rats, and in every case succeeded in demonstrating his theory by the death of the subject of inoculation, or post-mortem examination where it was killed for greater certainty and speed of demonstration.

On February 5, 1879, he inoculated a rat with virulent matter that had been preserved for seventy-eight days closely packed in dry wheat bran. The rodent was preserved for thirteen days, when it was killed and immediately dissected. The symptoms during life and the lesions found after death were so closely in keeping with those of swine-plague that there seemed no reasonable grounds for doubting the entire success of the inoculation. In order to confirm this, however, and place the matter beyond doubt, on February 19, 1879, a healthy hog was inoculated with the gland and lungs of the above-mentioned rat. The subject was then killed on the twentieth day, and showed the usual symptoms of the disease, proving that the rat was capable of thus conveying it to the hog.

In the third report of Dr. Law, which covered experiments since date of last report, the deduction was made that inoculation with the virus which has been cultivated in certain organic solutions was attended with little danger to the animal, and yet produced a condition of the system which effectively protected it from an attack of the dread disease.

The following was a summary of results arrived at during the different trials by experiments:

First. The inoculation of a hog with an excess of virus is always highly dangerous and often fatal in its results.

Second. Inoculation with a minimum quantity of virus produces relatively less dangerous results.

Third. Exposure to infection is comparable to inoculation with a minimum amount of virus.

Fourth. Reinoculation with fresh virus during the progress of the disease does not mitigate the illness nor protect against a further attack, but rather insures and hastens a fatal issue.

Fifth. Virulent matter which has been packed firmly in dry wheat bran has its potency increased.

Sixth. Partial putrefaction growth of the virulent products in a limited amount of air increases their potency.

Seventh. Inoculation with a culture of the virus in egg albumen seemed to protect against the effects of a subsequent inoculation with virus dried on a quill.

Eighth. Inoculation with a culture of the virus in human urine protected against the effects of subsequent inoculations with virus that had been preserved in a vacuum tube and with virus dried on a quill.

Ninth. Inoculation with the virus cultivated in cow's milk produced a mild attack and immunity against the effects of exposure in an infected pen.

In a supplement to his third report, and which was forwarded to the Department of Agriculture from Ithaca, N. Y., under date of March 14, 1881, Dr. Law gives the result of further experiments, continued with the same objects in view as explained in his previous reports.

The final results may be summed up under the two following heads:

First. The virulence and fatality of the swine-plague germ is increased when grown in a very limited amount of air and decreases as cultivated in free air.

Second. By placing the system of the hog under the influence of the chemical products of the growing swine-plague germ, though the germ itself is not introduced into the economy, the subject is rendered unsusceptible to a future attack of the disease.

Much stress is laid on the necessity by Dr. Law of giving plenty of space and abundant air to the hog when threatened with the disease. It appears by comparison that the hog consumes more than double the oxygen used by the horse or cow, and of course reduces a correspondingly greater amount of air to a condition that will not support respiration. If denied the requisite space and air the virus finds the most favorable conditions for its propagation, and that with the most deadly virulence. Confined sleeping places, combined with manure heaps and rotten-straw stacks, are certain propagators if not germinators of the plague.

It is recommended to thoroughly soak the timber before using same in the construction of hog-pens, as otherwise the germ-plague finds much easier entrance and much greater difficulty is found in its eradication when the pens are built of ordinary lumber.

It must be apparent that many of the objections to wooden hog-pens apply no less to railroad cars used in the transportation of swine. These are undoubtedly so many vehicles the bearers and the disseminators of contagion. Ships and boats are made additionally dangerous by the close atmosphere between the decks and the bilge-water in the hold. Soaking the wood-work of the cars and ships, and especially the floors, with oil is recommended as a preventive. Thorough cleansing and disinfection of such cars and ships should be done before using same for the conveyance of animals.

In investigating the subject of the growth and quality of the poisonous germs the great influence of electrical disturbances in the atmosphere can not be ignored. Such electrical disturbances are found to exert marked effect on the spread of the plague after once securing a hold on the herd.

Of all the seasons of the year summer seems to be by far the most dangerous. In winter the soil is bound up in frost and the disease germ consequently sealed and usually harmless. The hard surface can not be broken up by rooting, and therefore the germ can not be set free until the occurrence of the thaw. Thus it is that the disease often disappears during the winter months, but breaks out anew on the return of spring. But in summer the frozen germ in the soil, building, or other place is free to grow and multiply, and when set free by the rooting of the hog in the soil it spreads with frightful rapidity. Owing to the number of young hogs at this season that have never had the plague, more are subject to the disease and the contagion is greater.

There are drawbacks to be considered in viewing protective inoculation with mitigated virus as follows:

First. The protective inoculation retards growth and thriving.

Second. The method is a cause of the preservation of the disease germ.

In the former consideration it undoubtedly keeps back the subject from one to several weeks, a fact of some importance in so short-lived an animal as the hog. This, though, is largely discounted when the losses by the plague are considered.

The latter fact, of the preservation of the disease germ, is of far more weight when we take into consideration to protect a herd that is liable to be exposed to infection we must transmit to each animal the germ of the plague itself. As the germ in inoculation is deposited everywhere within the pen, great danger is run by newly born pigs as well as healthy hogs of contracting the plague itself from the inoculated hogs. To counteract this danger farmers are advised to make the inoculation as general as possible, and to include particularly all new arrivals who may be exposed to contract the disease.

Dr. Law in this report calls attention to the complications of whip-worms, lard-worms, round worms, round-mouthed worms, hook-headed worms, and the trichina spiralis, as occurring with the veritable hog-plague. He also noticed tuberculosis among the high-bred hogs.

In treatment he urges the following precautions:

First. See that it is the genuine hog-plague, uncomplicated with any other disease.

Second. Take the virulent fluid to be devitalized from the blood of a diseased animal at the height of the disease.

Third. Expose this fluid to 140° Fahrenheit, to be retained at this temperature for one or more hours.

Fourth. Swine to be operated upon should be removed from all diseased hogs and infected places.

Fifth. The injection should be from ten to twenty drops, and repeated at intervals of three days to a week.

Sixth. The animals should be guarded against infection for three weeks after the last injection of the devitalized virus.

The advantages of taking these precautions may be summed up as follows:

First. Immunity in a manner which does not entail the propagation of the living germ in the system of the animal to be protected.

Second. It does not risk the preservation, amplification, diffusion, or increase of potency of the disease germ.

Third. No need of exhaustive disinfection after the animals have been inoculated.

Fourth. The dose can be so graduated that there will be no risk of a fatal result.

Fifth. The system gradually affected by small doses.

Experiments with the blood of a suffocated hog transfused into the veins of living hogs produced no appreciable effect.

The following remedies were recommended by farmers in different parts of the country, and are given for what they are worth. Mr. F. I. Smith, president of the Independence County Agricultural and Mechanical Association, writes from Batesville, Ark.:

Each morning I sprinkled lime over the lying-down places and put a small quantity into the slops. It has proven as satisfactory as any remedy I have tried.

This gentleman further adds:

I have expended nearly $1,000 for improved and full-blooded hogs, and twice have I lost all on my place; yet I take extra care of my swine, keeping them well supplied with good spring water and fresh air, changing their beds every night.

One of the most indefatigable workers in the investigation of this disease is Dr. H. I. Detmers, V. S., whose experience is embodied in the four following reports, the first of which was forwarded from Chicago, Ill., under date of December 1, 1878, and covered the previous period from July 29, 1878, at which time he received his appointment from the Department of Agriculture. In this investigation he was assisted by F. W. Prentice, M. D., and Professor T. I. Burrill, M. A.

The disease, Dr. Detmers maintains, is sui generis, peculiar to swine; is neither cholera nor anthrax; it somewhat resembles the enteric fever or dothienenteria of man, but is not identical with the same, is contagious, is extremely fatal, especially among young animals, and exempts neither age, sex, nor breed, and is most fatal in such styes, pens, and yards in which many animals are crowded together.

The principal means of prevention must consequently consist in preventing a dissemination of the contagious or infectious principle, and in immediate, prompt, and thorough destruction of the same wherever it may be found. To prevent successfully a dissemination of the contagion and to secure a prompt destruction of the same stringent legislation is particularly recommended as being the only sure means to obtain this end. As it is, interstate and international traffic allow the most wholesale dissemination of the plague, and the hopelessness of eradicating the evil can be easily conceived when this state of affairs is considered.

The remainder of the report is devoted to the notice of experiments, which may be found at greater length in subsequent reports.

The second report of Dr. Detmers was forwarded from Chicago, Ill., dated July 25, 1879, and covered a period beginning on the previous December 28 (1878). He discovered nothing new in the nature of the disease but what had been embodied in his previous report, except he was convinced that by means of infected food and water it could be transferred to rats, rabbits, sheep, cattle, and dogs. He was also of the opinion that the disease was not so hopeless in the winter and spring as in the autumn and fall. In traveling through his district he was informed by Mr. Moore, who cultivated a farm some two miles north of Champaign, Ill., that late in the fall, after losing every hog on the place, his dog, a pointer, feasted on the unburied carcasses of hogs that had died of swine-plague. In less than two weeks the dog was taken sick, and showed symptoms identical, Mr. Moore says, with those exhibited by his diseased hogs. In about two weeks the dog was emaciated to a skeleton. It was over four years old, and Mr. Moore is positive that the disease communicated was swine-plague and not common dog-distemper, a disease which, by the way, was not prevailing in the neighborhood, and which rarely, if ever, attacks dogs over four years old.

Dr. Detmers was satisfied that patent medicines and secret medicines had done more harm than good in combating the disease. Mr. Hoyt, of Mendota, Ill., informed him that one of his neighbors who had invested in "Eureka Specific" had lost more in proportion than anybody else in the neighborhood. Swine-plague ought to be treated the same as rinderpest, pleuro-pneumonia, glanders, and farcy, by preventive measures.

The third report of Dr. Detmers covers investigations from April, 1880, to December of same year. He devoted most of this time to such investigations as would verify the results of former experiments, the most practical means of prevention, also to ascertain the predisposition to future attacks by those hogs that had recovered, and to study the causes which produced the infectious character of the disease as prevailing among swine, as distinguished from the disease of like character prevailing among other mammals, and also to human beings.

There is no doubt that the disease can attack one and the same animal twice and even three times, but if it does the second and third attacks are always mild and seldom fatal, if not complicated with other diseases. Generally, though, the first attack, provided the animal recovers, produces immunity for some time and possibly forever. It prevails more fatally in summer and autumn than in the winter and spring; the mortality is greater in large than in small herds and of a more deadly type, in proportion to the relative rapidity of infection. If the plague subsides for want of material, it will take considerable time to regain its former malignancy when the number in the herd is increased. A severe winter, continued snow, and a scarcity of swine in the spring will materially affect the existence of the disease in any territory where such factors in the calculation occur.

Though carbolic acid treatment in the first stages of the disease was found very efficacious, not much hope is expressed of ever discovering any method which would pay to save a hog if the later stage had been reached. Unless the attack was an exceedingly mild one, the hog would seldom be of any future account and only a source of loss to its owner. This is from the standpoint of relative profit to the farmer.

Continuing his line of investigation, Dr. Detmers made a fourth report, dated Champaign, Ill., October 30, 1881, in which he included the result of his experiments in prophylactics, from December, 1880, to previous mentioned date. His principal aim was to devise such means of prevention as would be easy of application and sufficiently simple that the ordinary farmer in the country would find no difficulty to apply quickly and effectively when threatened with the approach of the insidious destroyer.

Though the learned scientist acknowledges in the beginning of the report that our knowledge in regard to swine-plague is yet in its infancy, still he does not despair of devising practical means of prevention by prophylactics, encouraged as he was by the success of his treatment this year (1879–1880), which though, he adds, was one when the disease prevailed comparatively of a mild type.

The causes of this mildness of the disease was owing to the conditions brought about by natural events, as also due to human interference. The natural causes consisted of a hard winter, continuous frost, and lasting snow, as opposed to the previous year so fatal in its effects, which was a season respectively of light rains and heavy dews and short spells of unseasonable warm weather. The human interference was the division by the farmers of their swine into much smaller herds, which allowed greater care and cleanliness.

The result of experiments shows the great efficacy in prompt treatment with carbolic acid whenever a herd was threatened. It was also shown that the immunity from future infection was rendered almost certain after the hog had undergone this treatment. As this treatment is simple and entirely practicable to the average farmer, great stress was laid on the recommendation of its general adoption.

In continuing his investigation Dr. Detmers was convinced that the plague was more rapidly developed and comparatively more fatal in the timber and on the timbered borders of small streams than anywhere else. It might rage on such lands when destroyed on other portions of the farm by conditions unfavorable to its existence.

As means of prevention the following is recommended:

1. All hogs should be confined in yards or pens on approach of the disease.
2. Transportation of diseased or dead hogs prohibited by law under severe penalties.
3. No healthy hogs should be allowed access to running streams polluted by diseased hogs.
4. No healthy hogs should be allowed access to straw-stacks in the farm-yard.
5. All troughs, pens, yards, &c., should be kept clean, and hogs allowed to bathe in clean running water.
6. Castration, ringing, spaying, slitting the ears, &c., should be avoided during the prevalence of the plague in the neighborhood.
7. All diseased hogs should be kept separate from the healthy swine.
8. Also removed to places distant from the healthy herd.
9. All dead hogs should be promptly buried or cremated.
10. Healthy food administered, if cooked, as soon as possible.

In regard to prophylactic medicines, carbolic acid is given the palm after trying iodine, hyposulphite of soda, benzoate of soda, salicylic acid, thymic acid, and others too numerous to mention. The dose, eight to ten drops of a 95 per cent. solution three times a day for every hundred pounds of live weight. It is administered best in the water, milk, or slop, and under no circumstances should a hog be drenched, as when force is used the medicine is apt to go down the wind-pipe while it is squealing, and if not killed by suffocation on the spot, it is apt to die within a short time of inflammation of the lungs and respiratory passages.

Dr. D. E. Salmon sent in his first report on the swine-plague to the Department of Agriculture from Swannanoa, N. C., November 15, 1878, under the three following headings:

I. The losses of swine.
II. The nature and causes of the plague.
III. Means of prevention.

Losses.—For the year ending April 1, 1878, the losses in twenty-three counties of North Carolina, being the district covered by the report, the losses being computed in proportion to the number of hogs shown by a previous census, was nearly one-fourth, say 66,946 out of 304,492. In the early part of an outbreak from 70 to 90 per cent. died and few that recovered were of any value to the farmer.

The following were the losses in some of the counties:

Eastern North Carolina: Camden, 38 per cent.; Lenoir, 24 per cent.; Robeson, 14 per cent.; Hyde, 10½ per cent.

Western North Carolina: McDowell, 37 per cent.; Buncombe, 25½ per cent.; Mitchell, 15½ per cent.; Cherokee, 10½ per cent.

Nature of the disease.—The trouble is not local but general. The lungs, pleura, bronchial tubes, heart, liver, stomach, intestines, spleen, kidneys, bladder, and skin are all more or less affected.

Prevention.—Bisulphite of soda, salicylic acid, bichromate of potassa, and bromide of ammonia were all tried with little or no effect.

The second report of D. E. Salmon was forwarded to the Department of Agriculture from Asheville, N. C., on the 1st of December, 1880, and included the result of experiments made since the date of his previous report. He starts out in his investigations from the following data, being universally conceded as the result of previous knowledge on the subject:

1. The great epizoötics in the South and West being the result of one and the same disease.
2. The symptoms having been definitely ascertained.
3. The disease being contagious.
4. It may be communicated by inoculation to other species of animals.

In this report a difference of opinion is expressed as to the composition of the virus, as maintained by Drs. Klein and Detmers, though the following hypotheses are given to explain the discrepancy:

1. The diseases may not have been identical.
2. The same organisms may have assumed different forms under different conditions.
3. The filaments may have developed differently.
4. The virus may have been so transparent in the different experiments or the granules so small as to have produced different results when viewed under different microscopes.

An attempt was made to prove that the granules observed either were the cause of the disease or that they are an epiphenomenon; but owing to the fact that the virus in every case lost its activity after the first generation, or became too mild to afford satisfactory results, such evidence could not be obtained. It was found impossible to carry the virus beyond a second generation even by inoculating hogs that had never been exposed to contagion.

PORK PACKING.

The following statistics have been compiled from the annual report of the Cincinnati Price Current. The packing year consists of a summer season, from March 1 to November 1, and a winter season, from November 1 to March 1. The importance of the summer season for operation in pork packing is increasing, and during the summer of 1880 there was the usual gain over the year previous that has been noted since five years. The great pork-producing region of the country is in the West.

Summer packing.—The summer season of 1880 commenced with an abundant supply of hogs, and packing progressed more rapidly than in any previous season.

The number packed, weight per head, and yield of lard, during the last five years, was as follows:

Season.	Numbers.	Aggregate net weight.	Average net weight per head.	Aggregate yield of lard.	Average yield of lard per head.
		Pounds.	Pounds.	Pounds.	Pounds.

WINTER PACKING.

The season beginning November 1 opened with the price of pork about $1 per 100 pounds more than the previous year. The price subsequently fell, and the average price during the winter was 45 cents per 100 pounds higher than the preceding winter. The numbers packed, the weight per head, and the yield of lard, for the last five years, are as follows:

PACIFIC SLOPE.

California.—There was some increase in the number of hogs packed in California in 1880, compared with the preceding year, and the total was larger than any year since 1874. San Francisco continues to do the largest part of the packing, and operations are carried on throughout the year at this point.

The number packed at San Francisco, and the estimated number in other parts of the State, were 325,000, against 290,000 last year. The number packed in Oregon can not be obtained, but it is estimated at 75,000 in 1880, against 80,000 in 1879.

RECAPITULATION.

The total number of hogs packed in the United States during the last five years is as follows:

Section.	1876–'77.	1877–'78.	1878–'79.	1879–'80.	1880–'81.

SWINE-PLAGUE.

This is also a disease occasionally carried from this country to England, and which it is now believed can be brought under such control as will prevent in future much of the loss hitherto sustained by breeders and shippers, and may in time banish it in great part if not entirely from among us. Dr. H. J. Detmers, who has had ample opportunities for observing the disease in the swine-raising regions of Illinois, and devoted much of his time for more than two years in careful scientific experiments in regard to it, claims to have proven that inoculation with cultivated micrococci will as a rule produce a mild form of the plague, which he regards quite as efficient as a more severe attack in exempting from further contagion. During the past year he has experimented with a large number of preventives, and finds that carbolic acid, when given in suitable doses in drinking water, is a reliable agent, provided its administration is attended with a strict separation of healthy from diseased animals. It should be given as soon as the disease makes its appearance in the vicinage and continued as long as there is any danger of infection. It may be given regularly three times a day for three weeks without interfering in any perceptible manner with the thrift, growth, or appetite of the animal. If given after decided symptoms of the plague have appeared it does not seem to change in any perceptible degree the progress of the malady.

He says that while carbolic acid does not destroy the micrococci it appears to prevent conditions necessary for their development, and that although swine so treated may show slight symptoms of the plague, yet no serious danger need be apprehended. A full account of his interesting experiments, as well as those of Professor Law, of Cornell University, engaged in like inquiries, and of Dr. Salmon, veterinary surgeon, employed in the investigation of chicken-cholera, will be published in full hereafter. Professor Law's experiments, which were commenced in July last, for the purpose of determining the liability of swine to a second attack of the plague after having suffered from a mild attack induced by inoculation from cultivated virus, are not at this writing complete. He says:

"So far the observation seems to show that the inoculation with virulent matter cultivated at a rather low temperature in the media named seemed to protect pigs against a fatal attack of swine-plague, but it is desirable that the matter be tested much more extensively before any general assurance is given to this effect. It is interesting to note that the appearance of a hard nodule in the seat of the inoculation, and its persistence is in keeping with the result obtained by Pasteur in his inoculations with mitigated chicken-cholera virus, and possibly implies a localization of the disease in this seat without danger to the system at large, as is the case also in lung-plague in cattle. Ordinary wounds produce no such indurated new formations."

The United States can not afford any concealment of the truth in this matter of diseases of animals. Our great market for beef and dairy produce is Britain, and the demand of the English people for cheap meat can be met only from America. It would seem from statistical statements that in the year 1874 Great Britain had reached the maximum of meat production possible on the 47,000,000 acres of land under cultivation and pasturage in the United Kingdom.

A writer in the London Times of November 17, 1878, says:

"It is a matter of serious national concern that instead of having grown in number, the cattle in Great Britain in 1877 total up 2½ per cent. fewer than last year, and nearly 7 per cent. less than in 1874; that in 1874 we had been losing instead of multiplying in cattle and sheep. At this rate of diminution the number of head of cattle would be reduced to one-half in twenty-one years. The truth equally remains that British agriculture is at this moment unable to produce as many cattle and sheep as it possessed in field, fold, and shed only three years ago; and this in spite of the stimulating prices realized from meat throughout the whole period of this decline."

From this statement and others of similar character, made by various persons interested in the agriculture of the United Kindom, it is plain to be seen that not only must the British people seek their meat supply from other sources than their own fields, but that the demand will be an increasing one. Their deficiency can not be supplied from any source as cheaply as from the United States.

Several bills have heretofore been introduced and proposed for Congressional action; none, however, that in my judgment are entirely adequate to the matter in hand; unless the power of the General Government can be exercised within the borders of the different States and legally sustained and enforced, it is not worth while to pass any laws, other than those already enacted, authorizing an examination into the disease and the mapping out and defining of its limits, to serve in some sort as a notification to State authorities of a pestilence within their borders that may overwhelm them and prove disastrous to the entire nation. The well-known virulence and the fatality of the disease, the terror felt on its appearance by other nations that have experienced its ravages, and the well-understood and dearly learned fact that annihilation is the only effective method of suppressing and eradicating it yet discovered, certainly warrant the interference of the strong arm backed by the full purse of the General Government in whatever broad prairie or corner acre a single case of pleuro-pneumonia may be found.

Mr. BAYNE. I offer the following amendment.

Mr. BELFORD. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. WELLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. I find by the rules of the House that members of the Committee on Agriculture have their mouths closed as to their action in the committee, and yet it is assumed before this House the committee were unanimous in reporting this bill. I have desired to be recognized by the chairman for the express purpose of doing that which I can not do otherwise than by offering an amendment; and I wish to inquire of the Chair if he will not indicate to me the time to offer it, for I lack the cheek and the brass to get up here on all occasions whether in season or out of it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Iowa will be recognized when the rules of the House will permit the Chair to recognize him; which will be when the gentleman rises in his place before some other gentleman shall do so and offers an amendment when it is in order to offer it. The Chair will take great pleasure in recognizing him.

Mr. BAYNE. I move the adoption of the amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out after the word "thereof," in line 5, the words "who shall be a competent veterinary surgeon and."

Also in line 6, after the word "to," strike out the words "investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use, and also." In line 9, after the word "contagious," insert the word "infectious." Also in line 10 strike out the word "them" and insert "cattle, sheep, and swine;" so that, if amended, this first section will read:

"That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall organize in his department a bureau of animal industry and shall appoint a chief thereof, whose duty it shall be to inquire into and report the causes of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases among cattle, sheep, and swine," &c.

Mr. WELLER. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has the right to offer an amendment to the amendment, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania is now entitled to the floor in support of his amendment.

Mr. BAYNE. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that all the force and vitality of that first section is preserved by the amendment I propose, by confining the operation of this branch of the Department of Agriculture to an inquiry as to the causes of infectious, communicable, and contagious diseases of domestic animals. The object purporting to be subserved by this bill will be reached by the amendment which I have proposed, whereas if the provisions which I suggest shall be stricken out are retained in the bill, the business of the Agricultural Department will be unnecessarily and largely increased as compared with what it would be with the words stricken out. If these words are stricken out, the force contemplated by the bill could be employed to carry into effect its provisions without having any inquiry to make except as to the nature of these communicable, infectious, or contagious diseases; and the twenty persons provided by the bill can be profitably and properly employed in that direction and no other. With the words remaining in the bill, the employment of these agents will be extended to ascertaining the number of cattle, the number of domestic animals of all kinds, their value and condition and their use; all of which may be ascertained from the reports of the Census Department of the Government, and have been ascertained already.

I presume it is not designed by this bill to inaugurate a separate investigation in that direction by the Agricultural Department; and yet if these words to which I have referred are left in it, it accomplishes that result whether intended or not.

I submit to my friend from Missouri, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, that in its present form the bill only adds to the duties of this board or bureau appointed by the Commissioner of Agriculture the duty of making this enumeration, and that by leaving these words in the bill he renders it less perfect and less operative in the way of doing the work the measure contemplates. I therefore ask the adoption of the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] has offered the amendment and is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WELLER. I send to the desk an amendment to the amendment, which I desire to submit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 1 by adding to the word "investigate," in line 6, the words "and ascertain by reference to and compilations from the reports made by county, State, and national authority."

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment with the express purpose of making the work of the Commissioner of Agriculture valuable without the expense that would attend it if he were to employ the force in the manner that has been suggested, by taking a census of the domestic animals. By the adoption of the amendment which I have offered, or the substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I am of the opinion that all the investigation that would be needed in the premises would be such as can be had and all the information required would be obtained from the compilations from the returns made by the county, State, or national authorities on this subject.

If I heard aright a few moments ago I heard the chairman of our committee state that the Commissioner of Agriculture had already received from various States in the Union voluminous reports in the premises with reference to diseases of cattle, and to which the animal industries of the nation are subject. It must be borne in mind that we have but $250,000 appropriated by this bill. If, then, these agents are selected to make an investigation throughout the length and breadth of our land, I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that $250,000 would scarcely be, if I may so express it, a drop in the bucket, if that were the method to be employed. But if the method which I propose shall be adopted, and this amendment is made a part of the bill, then he may make reference to the compilations from reports of county, State, and national authorities on this subject, precluding the necessity of these agents going through the country to ascertain facts which are already in existence. And that, therefore, would not trench at all upon the $250,000 which could be saved for carrying out the other purposes of the bill. It seems to me that the State of Iowa, the State of Illinois, the State of Texas, and I may say every State in the Union, have now systems of census reports in the matter of agricultural interests that will permit the Commissioner of Agriculture to get at all of the facts which are necessary in this connection without additional expense. For this reason I am in favor of trenching not at all upon this $250,000. In this manner the twenty agents who are appointed to get this information will not need to go through the country to obtain it, but can secure it without expense by these reports to which I have referred.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to strike out the last word.

My speaking at all to-day was suggested by what the gentleman from Iowa last on the floor said [Mr. WELLER]. He submitted an amendment and said something about his being somewhat lacking in "brass." Then I remembered that my friend from Virginia whom I do not see in his seat [Mr. JOHN S. WISE]—I do not mean the other WISE, I mean JOHN S. WISE—seemed to make a very unwise attack on me the other day. I had not the remotest idea he was going to attack in that peculiar way. He came to my seat a few minutes before he spoke. He indicated that he had a line of thought that was something jocular and kindly. He asked would I object to it. He mentioned some of his personal points. I said "Go on; I loved your father, and I love his pluck and your courtesy. I like a man who speaks out what he has to say about another before his face and not behind his back." And thus induced he comes dashing along with this remarkable, incongruous speech. I have been told by partial friends that it should be answered. He said:

I heard my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. COX], and I am proud to call him my friend, boasting the other day that he was a sort of shining light, a monument of Democracy, to point out these doctrines of State rights and strict construction. I accept, I will say to the gentleman, his own designation of himself. I will not call him a monument, but I would call him a pillar of brass by day and a pillar of gas by night [laughter] to lead the wandering tribes of latter-day Democracy out of the desert in which they have been lost for lo! these many years.

This expression about the monument was from a Republican colleague [Mr. HISCOCK] toward me, which in good temper I accepted as given, but quite modestly, without brass or gas. My remarks were only two minutes long.

Well, now, sir, for curiosity I look at the RECORD. I find I have done less of speaking during this session than this callow fledgeling from Virginia. [Laughter.] But one thing I would not do. If my father had been a member of Congress ever so conspicuous I would not have brought him into this debate in that peculiar connection. But this is a matter of taste, about which I do not quarrel.

Again, the gentleman said in this unaccountable animadversion upon me and my peculiar State-rights ideas that West Virginia had been "ripped untimely"—no, it was not that, that is Shakespeare; it was something else he said; I am almost timid about quoting it:

As for West Virginia, whose Representative here saw fit unprovokedly to take a fling at old Virginia, I want to tell him that his little State is nothing but the bastard offspring of a political rape committed upon poor old Virginia, cut from her by a Cæsarian operation by the Federal Government.

Then the gentleman turned his philippic upon me. What for? Because I was one of those who stood here during the war contending against this untimely ripping of West Virginia from the womb of the grand old mother of States and Presidents. Is this the gentleman who so praises his father because he desired practical legislation in the relations of Virginia? Is this the gentleman who desired not mere abstractions, and who denounced in this very speech the very men he now sits among, and whose party committed this illegitimate outrage upon old Virginia in her worst peril?

I do not speak with any heat about this gentleman. He says before he commences to assail me that he is my friend. I expected some gentle words and something in the best vein of his family tradition, nothing tipped with malice or poison. I have been waiting for him all day here in a friendly way, but he does not seem to come to renew the friendly encounter. I hear he is in the Senate, doing some work there. But no gentleman on either side has spoken about this curious speech who has not said it was ill-timed and in bad taste. I regret that he made it, because I respect the father if I can not do everything to honor the son.

I knew, sir, that this designation of "a pillar of brass by day and a pillar of gas by night" must have come somewhere or in some style from the Old Testament. I looked it up. I could hardly keep this good old book for a minute, there was such a rush from the Republican side of the House to read the Bible. [Laughter.] Now, where did the gentleman [Mr. JOHN S. WISE] get his wisdom about the ancients and their exodus? We know who went with Moses out of Egypt and helped him in his time of trouble. It is said:

And the Lord went before them by day in a pillar of a cloud to lead them in the way; and by night in a pillar of fire to give them light; to go by day and night.

He took not away the pillar of the cloud by day nor the pillar of fire by night from before the people.

It was a wonderful exodus; not physically, nor for length of time and endurance, but for wise and wonderful ends. When I went to Jerusalem not long since, I will say with humility that I did not look so much for the old and beautiful walled city, or the brook of Kedron, or the valley of Jordan far away toward the dead leaden sea. I looked into the sky toward the mountains of Moab, almost nebulous in beauty, but solid in their eastern walls. Around there, out of this half cloud-land, came the hosts of Israel; not, by a perversion of the beauteous Scriptures with brass and gas, but by some supernal and glorious agency. The gentleman from Virginia should read his Bible before he comes to Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. TOWNSHEND obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. COX, of New York.

Mr. COX, of New York. I was about to go along with the children of Israel. [Laughter.] I like them because they are persecuted; and though their soil be calcined with desolation, nevertheless it is grand in solemn memories. It is entitled to respect even in its present low estate for its traditions of prophet, saint, and Saviour.

And so I am put down here by the gentleman from Virginia as a sort of Moses to lead them forth, the bewildered children of our Democratic Israel! One thing I know, and that is, that where Moses led them they passed through safely. They were not overwhelmed as were the Egyptian Readjusters by the peculiar Red Sea of that Commonwealth. [Laughter.]

There is one thing about the old Jewish ceremony and autonomy that I respect. That is, the care they gave to their beasts of burden, sheep, and cattle. The best beef produced in the world was Hebraic. If my friend had studied more of the old Hebraic system and less by large, loose, latitudinarian constructions of the Constitution he would have known better how to cure pleuro-pneumonia and cure the diseases of cattle.

This disease is limited to a few precincts around Jersey City, New York city, and along the Hudson. It has not, and never can have, its operations extended over the United States.

I wish I could read this Bible for the information of the House here to-day [laughter], if only on the mode of curing and butchering cattle.

Mr. BELFORD. You would not be a Democrat if you did. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX, of New York. I knew a Republican who read it, and he got so distracted that he jumped out of a fourth-story window. [Laughter.]

I saw from the RECORD to-day that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. J. S. WISE] was appointed a member of the Committee on the Census, of which I am chairman. Our rules only provide for eleven members on the committee. He is the twelfth man. The RECORD is in error, as only eleven are appointed. I was reading only yesterday a Russian novel by a famous Russian author who has just died——

Mr. LYMAN. Turganieff.

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes, sir; Ivan Gergiyevitch Turganieff. Thank you! You are always scholarly and beautiful. [Laughter.] He has written a story called "The Diary of a Superfluous Man." [Laughter.] In it he tells of a man—himself—who was so good that he had not any sense. [Laughter.] Others may be good or bad, wise or foolish, agreeable or disagreeable; but superfluous people none but me, one beyond the number required—and nothing more! Nature had not counted on my coming into the world, and in consequence she treated me as an unexpected, unwanted visitor. "What was the cause of this trifling strife with myself?"

Where did the gentleman get this impulse to step into this debate? Perhaps he did not know there were any fighting qualities in this old arena! Now, when he gets down to Virginia and makes a great to do about having got up a debate with me, with a single small State-rights bantam like myself, I want to be understood that he begged pardon of me before he made his ill-timed speech.

I think I have said enough in his absence. If he were here I would say more.

In conclusion, let me come down to the matter in debate. This bill ought to be amended pretty nearly as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] has suggested. There might be something done; very little, but something might be done without intrenching on well-grounded creeds of faith and rules of interpretation. I would, therefore, favor a recommittal of this bill—with two objects, yet to be developed, and which if they did not kill the bill would take out of it many obnoxious provisions.

Mr. GIBSON. I rise for the purpose of indorsing the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] as meeting my ideas of good faith in legislating upon this subject.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. If the gentleman proposes to occupy his five minutes under the rule in opposing the amendment, I make the point that the time for debate in opposition to the amendment has been exhausted. If the gentleman wishes merely to reply to what the gentleman from Virginia [JOHN S. WISE] said the other day, I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. GIBSON. Then I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to speak upon his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GIBSON. During the progress of this bill it became my privilege, under a sense of duty to my constituents and to the country, to object to certain features in it. In the inception of that discussion I expressed my surprise at the hostility manifested upon the other side to everything like State rights. I said that when I remembered the alacrity with which they rushed to the doctrine of State rights, and the tenacity with which they hugged it to their bosom when it enabled them by a corrupt coalition with MAHONE to secure power in the State of Virginia, I could not well see where their objections to that doctrine now came in.

For that language the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JOHN S. WISE] arraigned me, and not only arraigned me but arraigned my State, and proceeded to quote some of the language of his old father, whom I knew well, as a boy could know an old man, and whose confidence and friendship I had the pleasure of sharing, and when I followed him in war I had the honor of having his tears shed over our misfortune.

I say that his son came in here and quoted language used by his father in the heat of a great political contest in the State of Virginia. I feel satisfied that if he were here now, out of the kindness of his heart such language would never be uttered against any sister State. That gentleman charges that my State is a bastard State, the offspring of a corrupt and tyrannical political action. When he assails and denounces in coarse terms the actions of your party, you have sunk so low as to applaud him for it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. That is severe, but beautiful.

Mr. LYMAN. "Which is sarcastical," if beautiful.

Mr. GIBSON. I do not speak it for sarcasm, but for truth. The gentleman talks about my State being a political bastard, and he assails me for having left the State of Virginia and gone to the State of West Virginia. It is true I was born and raised in Virginia; all my early manhood was passed in that State. I stood with her in all her struggles; afterward, in the days of reconstruction, when the white civilization of that State was struggling to its utmost against overthrow by negro domination I was there and again stood by her, and I have the honor of believing that I was then approved by the young son of the former governor of that State.

I left that State believing that we had accomplished a great victory; that Hunnicut and Underwood and Dr. Bayne had been overthrown, and that civilization would there move forward in accordance with the old time conservative, straightforward, honest doctrines of that old State. But to my surprise news came over the mountains that after Hunnicut, Underwood, and Bayne had been routed a new force, with new leaders, among them my distinguished young friend over there——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLAND. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman.

Mr. GIBSON. A new force had arisen with new leaders, among whom was my distinguished young friend. It is no part of mine to criticise Virginia politics. It is enough for me to bear my portion of the politics of the State which I in part represent.

But let me say to my young friend, when he talks about political bastards, that he should remember that he himself is, as a Readjuster or Coalition Representative on this floor, the result of a political rape on the State of West Virginia by Federal power. But for the interference of the Federal Government in Virginia politics, but for the interposition of the strong arm of Federal power, I doubt very much if with all his father's prestige and with all his own talent and energy he could have ever succeeded in representing on this floor the people of that State. I am the more satisfied of this because the result of the recent elections in that State has overwhelmingly defeated and trodden under foot the coalition thus formed.

I did not expect to escape the sharp retorts of the young gentleman in this discussion. When a man like my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. COX], whose gentleness and kindliness of heart have given him a warm place in the estimation of every intelligent person in this land, whose acquirements and national reputation have made him respected and honored by the people—when he is denounced here in flippant terms as "a pillar of brass by day and of gas by night" [laughter], I could not expect that I or my little State should escape entirely.

But let me say to the gentleman, in honor of my State, that whatever her birth may have been, she is to-day standing among the proud, progressive States of this Union. She is to-day one of the most rapidly developing States in all this broad land. Her forests are being cleared, her mines are being opened, railroads are being built, school-houses and churches everywhere rear themselves. We in the State of West Virginia are doing our part toward building up the material and moral interests of the country and are marching along in the path of progress, while my unfortunate old mother State is struggling in the trammels of her fight with MAHONE and Mahoneism.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MAYO. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to occupy the time of the House in discussing matters not at issue, but I can not allow the taunts of the representative of the bastard child of a political rape to go unanswered on the part of the Old Dominion. He speaks of a "foul coalition," but he can not yet say, in the words of Daniel Webster, that it is a "murdered coalition." Thank God, it is yet alive, and it means to pluck old Virginia out of the hands of the Bourbon faction that is now undertaking to put down all law and all order in that State. [Applause.] Never before in the history of Virginia has any Legislature assembled in her halls that has disgraced her as she is disgraced by the Legislature now in session. I hope to God such a scene as is now being enacted there will never be enacted again on this continent.

In order to keep themselves in power the party having control of that Legislature have deliberately thrown out members enough in both houses to give themselves a majority sufficient to pass, in spite of the governor's disapproval, any bill that he may veto. And what happened no longer than two days ago? A man to whom they had refused a seat had been a second time declared by his constituents elected. He was entitled to his seat on the first election, but was kept out and sent back for a new election. Two days ago, when the question came up, a resolution was presented in this form:

Resolved, That Mr. Rue is not entitled to the seat.

What was the vote? Thirteen to fourteen, thereby declaring that the man was entitled to the seat. But by some legerdemain or hocus-pocus in comes the other man, Callahan; and lo and behold! after having voted down the resolution declaring that Mr. Rue was not entitled to the seat, they vote that Mr. Callahan is; and this is done without a particle of evidence save the newspaper reports that this man was run as a candidate against the other. One man has a certificate, the other has none; and they deliberately swear in the man that has not a certificate and keep out the man that has! This is a specimen of what has been going on in Virginia since this Legislature met. Deliberately, persistently, regardless of every precedent and all law, taking the bull by the horns, they have undertaken to "get rid of MAHONE," as they say, by any means, no matter what.

And why? I say before this House that the Coalition party of Virginia has done more to lift the State from the degradation in which it had been sunk by the Bourbon "Funder" party than has ever been done by any party before in four years' time. We took control of the State when there was not a dollar in the treasury, when we had to borrow $200,000 in order to pay the members of the Legislature and to avoid turning the lunatics from the asylum and the convicts from the penitentiary. The schools had been closed by reason of the use of the school fund for other purposes, until they had been reduced from 6,000 down to 2,500. During four years we built up the interests of the State; and I, as an honest, debt-paying Republican, took hold of WILLIAM MAHONE and his party because I believed, as General Grant believed, that they were the only people in Virginia who did mean to pay the debt.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOHN S. WISE obtained the floor.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I make the point of order that debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order of the gentleman from Missouri, and recognizes the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JOHN S. WISE] to make his motion.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is in order.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. Mr. Chairman, when I was at a distant place, engaged upon important business, I little expected that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] would take this floor to respond to anything that I had said, because when a gentleman rose the other day for the purpose of making some remarks in reference to another member, the gentleman from West Virginia made the point that the person referred to was absent. I did not need to hear what the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] said, because I knew that whatever he said would be kindly, would be manly, would be more than good. Whatever expression I used concerning him he knew would be kind, and if it was a little impudent, I knew he would excuse it.

Mr. COX, of New York. It was excused.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. Yes; and I am glad it was. But the gentleman ought to be thankful to me that I have given him occasion to look into that long-neglected book from which he read. [Laughter and applause.] But, sir, I find even now his examination of it has been most perfunctory, and he misquoted the name of the sea which overwhelmed the wandering tribes. And I wish to say, however, that the only sea that overwhelmed the Coalition party of Virginia, the only sea that ever could or ever would overwhelm it, was the Red Sea of blood, shed by Bourbonism. [Cries of "Good!" and applause on Republican side.]

Now, sir, I did not intend to wander from this book, but to point out to this gentleman the simple fact that the Congress of this nation has pegged away, and instead of arguing matters on their merits, there is always some strict constructionist to waste the valuable time of this House in catching fleas with strict construction. [Laughter.] I say, sir, and I take but little time to say it, when it comes to who are the State-rights advocates of this nation it will be seen that all this gabble and all this talk of State-rights strict construction have been as nothing compared with that splendid Federal tribunal, the creature of the Federal power, the Supreme Court of the United States, which has done more to maintain true State rights than all the shriekers about strict construction who ever got a place within this Hall. [Cries of "True!" and applause on the Republican side.] Yes, that is unquestionably true.

And so to-day I come from old Virginia. I admit I knew the gentleman in Virginia, but when I knew him he was wrestling every day with a negro on the floor of the convention, and I never could tell how he came out of it except from the fact that he left and the negro is there yet. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] I say, sir, therefore, however Virginia may appear to degenerate, that, thank God, there are those of us whose ancestors have lived there for two hundred and fifty years, and who in the hour of her adversity have stood by her and proclaimed that manhood, that pure Virginianism should prevail, and have not sneaked off to prosperous new communities. [Laughter.]

And thus I leave the subject, standing here and saying to the committee I believe this bill which has been brought here is plainly and clearly within the powers of the Federal Government, and that those who live in eternal jealousy of the Government, and look upon it as an alien, can see in it no real defect for the purpose of correcting the evils which exist under the powers of the Federal Congress. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move that the committee do now arise.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to inquire whether debate has been exhausted, either actually or theoretically, in answer to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE]. I wish to say a word on that amendment when I can get the opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa will have that opportunity.

The motion of Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 58) filling an existing vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; when the Speaker signed the same.

MEXICAN CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 26, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

NAMING OF A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary [Mr. ANSON G. MCCOOK] called the Senate to order and read the following:

To the Senate:

Pursuant to the provisions of the rules, I hereby name and designate Hon. HENRY B. ANTHONY, a Senator from the State of Rhode Island, to perform the duties of the chair for Tuesday, February 26 instant.

GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,
President pro tempore.

WASHINGTON, D. C., 26th February, 1884.

Mr. ANTHONY thereupon took the chair as presiding officer for to-day.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the requirements of the act of July 15, 1870, a full and complete inventory of all property belonging to the United States in the buildings, rooms, offices, and grounds occupied by or under the charge of the Department of the Interior; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER presented a communication from R. B. Curry, auditor and clerk of the city of Portland, Oreg., transmitting resolutions adopted by the common council of the city of Portland, Oreg., February 11, 1884, urging Congress to secure to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company all the lands granted by the act of July 2, 1864, and acts supplemental thereto and amendatory thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I present a petition signed by a large number, if not the entire bar of Saint Paul, and citizens of that city, stating that owing to the continually increasing business of the Federal courts and consequent additional labor required of the circuit and district judges thereof, they are of opinion that the present salaries paid them are entirely inadequate, and praying an increase of their salaries. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I also present a petition of members of the bar and citizens of Winona, Minn., a petition of members of the bar and citizens of Red Wing, Minn., and a petition of members of the bar and citizens of Stillwater, Minn., all of them praying an increase of the salaries of the circuit and district judges of the United States. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I present a memorial and resolutions adopted at a meeting of David Harding Post, No. 28, Department of Iowa, Grand Army of the Republic, Allerton, Iowa, in which they request their Senators and Representatives in Congress to use all honorable means to defeat the passage of what is known as the Fitz-John Porter bill. The same post asks Congress to grant pensions to all ex soldiers and sailors of the late war who served thirty days or were in any engagement therein, and also favor the passage of a bill for the equalization of bounties. I move that the memorial and resolutions be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON presented a petition of citizens of Freeman, Dak., praying that an appropriation be make for education in Alaska; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Des Moines, Iowa, remonstrating against the passage of a bankrupt bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORGAN. I present the petition of H. W. Sage, Andrew D. White, David B. Hill, S. D. Halliday, William H. Sage, W. D. Wilson, W. Van Cleef, and Marcus Lyon, of the State of New York, in respect of the treaty of reciprocity with Mexico, in which they state that they "believe that the ratification of this treaty would inure to the common benefit of the whole country; that it would immediately stimulate the export trade of the country, and very largely relieve the manufacturing interests by opening to them a new market of 10,000,000 of people."

In conformity with what I understand to be a rule adopted or at least followed here I will ask that the petition lie upon the table for disposal at a time when the Senate may be in executive session.

Mr. MORRILL. Has it not been the rule that such petitions should be presented in executive session?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the opinion of the Chair that the petition should be presented in executive session.

Mr. MORGAN. I have heard of no such rule as that; and if I had heard of it I should have resented it to the extent of my power as a breach of the constitutional powers and privileges of the people of the United States, for they have a right to petition Congress in open session, and what disposition we shall make of their petition is a different matter. We may dispose of it in executive session, but the right of the people to petition us in open session must be allowed, or otherwise the right of petition amounts to nothing.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say to the Senator that so far as I am concerned I would much prefer to have such petitions presented in open session of the Senate and have the treaty itself discussed in open session; but the course I suggested was adopted upon the presentation of similar petitions heretofore, and I supposed it was the rule.

Mr. MORGAN. We have a rule against the consideration of treaties in open session, but we have no rule against the presentation of petitions in open session, and whenever such a rule as that is attempted to be made here I shall for one give my vote against it, because I can not consent to violate the right of the people of this country to have their petitions presented and the substance of them at least stated in the open sessions of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The practice has been that all petitions relating to executive business should be presented in executive session. That has been the decision from the chair by the permanent presiding officer.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall again present the petition in executive session.

Mr. HAWLEY presented the petition of J. L. Tomlinson, Jacob L. Greene, and 123 other citizens of Connecticut, praying for a repeal of the limitation of four years applied to the tenure of certain administrative offices; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. PALMER presented a petition of the Soldiers and Sailors' Association of Southwestern Michigan, praying for the establishment of a national soldiers' home in Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLAIR presented a memorial of Admiral Farragut Post, No. 52, Grand Army of the Republic, of New Hampshire, remonstrating against the removal of pension agencies from different portions of the country and the payment of pensions at Washington; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have in my hand a communication which is more in the nature of a petition than anything else, although it is addressed to me personally. It is on the subject of the losses and disasters occasioned by the floods on the Ohio River. It comes from a town known as Tell City, on the Ohio River, and is one of the few towns without railroad or telegraphic communications. It is largely signed by the leading and influential people of that place, and it sets out so strongly the necessity of action in the line proposed yesterday by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] that inasmuch as the paper is very short I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the paper will be read.

The paper was read, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as follows:

TELL CITY, IND., February 21, 1884.

SIR: As you are aware, that portion of our State which borders on the Ohio River has again been visited by a great calamity in the shape of a flood, exceeding even that of the year 1883.

We were hardly recovered from the effects of the former flood when the rising waters again inundated the Ohio Valley, almost entirely submerging some places, among them this town of Tell City, of which by far the principal part is covered by from three to ten feet of water.

This town is a colonization of laborers and others of small means, who formed societies in the larger cities for the purpose of colonizing and thus easier acquiring a home of their own; they bought the site of the present town and built it up under extreme difficulties almost out of a swamp. It remains a town of people of very moderate means, is a manufacturing place, and nearly all of its industries were originated and are now carried on on the co-operative plan, the mechanics owning the factories.

Under these circumstances we are unable to cope with a repetition of such adversities as the late floods. The flood alone did immense damage, but the storm of the 19th instant, with the turbulent waters, overturned dwellings, made others unsafe and uninhabitable, partially destroyed some factory buildings, overturned and swept away large quantities of stacked and seasoned lumber, the importance of which can only be appreciated when it is remembered that our industrial establishments are mostly wood-working factories.

Add to all of this late large losses by fire and the present loss of trade and loss of time by the poorer operatives, and the inability of the other citizens to render material aid, and you will understand that the damage and results of the flood become doubly oppressive to this community.

We learn that Congress has magnanimously voted large sums which are to be used to provide food and raiment for the destitute, but as the honorable governor of our State, A. G. Porter, very aptly suggested on the occasion of his visit here of yesterday, we are very much in need of some pecuniary assistance; something to help us rebuild and repair our factories, our homes, and our streets, which are left in an impassable condition; also to replace fencing for many poor people who contrive to support large families by adding to the earnings of the laborer the proceeds of cultivating small farms and lots of vacant lands.

We hope that a consideration of the facts above recited will convince you of the importance and necessity of a pecuniary assistance by the General Government, and we most respectfully pray that if such assistance is granted you will kindly suggest the name of this town when the same is distributed.

G. Huthstimer, cashier Tell City Bank; Chas. Steinauer, Tell City mills; Lawrence Keifer, township trustee; Aug. Meninger, saw-mill proprietor; Jos. Adam, hub factory; Wiedmer, Cloussier & Co., machine-shop; W. S. Lamb, United States storekeeper and gauger; Aug. Schreiber, deputy internal-revenue collector and druggist; Lawrence Keifer, barrel factory; Magnus Vireisle & Son, Tell City planing-mill; Jno. T. Patrick, county clerk; J. M. Combe, county treasurer; M. Bottinger, president Tell City Bank; Ant. Moraneck, president Southwestern Furniture Co.; Ant. Moraneck, hotel proprietor; J. C. Harrer, agent of Tell City Furniture Co.; Wm. Bettinger, Tell City woolen mills; Clay Switzer, wharfmaster; Jno. Herrmann, of Herrmann & Bro., manufacturers of wagons; Philipp Grimmeissen, president of trustees of town board; A Raalz, agent Cabinet-makers' Union; Combs, Hartman & Co., chair manufacturers; C. F. Bolt, postmaster and editor of Tell City Anzeiger.

Hon. DANIEL W. VOORHEES,
Senator for the State of Indiana, Washington, D. C.

Mr. VEST presented the petition of D. C. Tunnell and other citizens of Barton County, Missouri, praying for amendments to the Chinese immigration act making it a criminal offense to import Chinese; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARRISON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1310) to abolish the military reservation of Fort Rice, in the Territory of Dakota, and authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to have the lands embraced therein surveyed and made subject to homestead and pre-emption entry and sale the same as other public lands, to report it adversely. I do not return the bill with any written report, and therefore desire to say that this adverse report is made upon the ground that the committee have already considered the subject of general regulations relating to military reservations which have come to be useless in the military service and have reported a bill upon that subject. We report this bill adversely because it is covered by the general provisions of the bill referred to. I move that this bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I am also directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a petition of ex soldiers and sailors of Kansas praying for the establishment of a soldiers' home in that State, to report it back and to say that the committee have considered this subject, and have reported a bill authorizing the location of a soldiers' home west of the Mississippi River. Perhaps it is scarcely accurate to say that the committee report adversely upon the petition. We have provided for the location of a home, though we have not limited it to the State of Kansas. It may simply be stated that the petition is reported back with the report that action has already been taken upon the subject by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. HARRISON. I am also directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back to the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War of the date of December 11, 1883, transmitting, in compliance with section 1136 of the Revised Statutes, plans of the proposed new barrracks for the light battery at Fort Adams, Rhode Island, and to ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the communication, and that it be referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Appropriations, where it properly belongs.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 266) granting a pension to Joseph McGuckian, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1176) granting a pension to John K. Hummer, submitted an adverse report thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be postponed indefinitely, if there be no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to ask the Senator from Illinois whether there is a written report accompanying the Hummer bill?

Mr. CULLOM. There is.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I will wait until I have an opportunity to read it, and if I think I can overcome the views of the committee I shall ask to have the bill placed on the Calendar. I shall not interpose now.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1173) granting a pension to Catharine Bullard, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 838) to consolidate the Bureau of Military Justice and the corps of judge-advocates of the Army, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MAXEY. I am also instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to move that the bill (S. 1541) to provide promotion in the corps of judge-advocates be indefinitely postponed, as the objects sought to be accomplished by that bill are covered by the bill just reported.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 895) for the relief of J. D. Morrison, surviving partner of C. M. & J. D. Morrison, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 919) for the relief of John M. McClintock, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1352) for the relief of William McNamara, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the bill be placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 83) for the relief of John H. Walker, late a captain in the United States Army, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 334) for the relief of Edward Byrne, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CAMDEN. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 262) relating to the muster-rolls of the Oregon volunteers, to submit an adverse report thereon, for the reason that the Secretary of War, in a communication which is filed and made a part of the report, states that there is no additional legislation necessary to accomplish the object of the bill. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. 445) for the relief of the heirs or legal representative of Robert J. Baugness, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SLATER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1185) for the relief of Belva A. Lockwood, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. COLQUITT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Matilda Watmough, widow of John G. Watmough, deceased, praying for arrearages of pension, reported adversely thereon; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 917) granting a pension to Alida Dennis, widow of Benjamin H. Dennis, late a private in Company I, Thirty-first Regiment United States Colored Troops, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JACKSON. I am also instructed by the Committee on Pensions to report adversely on the bill (S. 986) granting a pension to Laura Prine. At the request of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] I ask that it be placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 909) to increase the pension of Martin Kelly and to rate him in the second grade of pensioners, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. INGALLS. The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1108) to provide for the sale of the Iowa Indian reservation in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, for the issuance of a patent for a reservation for the Iowa tribe of Indians in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, direct me to report an amendment by way of substitute, which I ask may be twice read and placed on the Calendar, and the original bill indefinitely postponed. The facts are set forth in a correspondence between the Committee on Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior that I have incorporated in my report, and which I ask may be printed.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that the substitute is a disposition of the original bill and there need be no separate action postponing it.

Mr. INGALLS. I yield to the superior parliamentary knowledge of the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A substitute is usually treated as an amendment to the original bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is reported with an amendment, and will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 1636) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to the Arickaree, Gros Ventre, and Mandan Indians on the Fort Berthold Indian reservation in Dakota, and granting patents therefor, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, on motion of Mr. DAWES, recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1017) to prohibit the mailing of newspapers and other publications containing lottery advertisements and prescribing a penalty for the violation of the same, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. JACKSON. On behalf of the minority of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, I submit the views of the minority against the passage of the bill. I ask that they be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The views of the minority will be printed.

Mr. JACKSON. I suggest that the two reports be printed together. It will be more convenient to the Senate to have them in that shape.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the usual practice.

FRAUDULENT IMPORTATIONS OF WOOL.

Mr. MORRILL. On the 21st of January a resolution was passed by the Senate calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for copies of a report relating to the fraudulent undervaluation or classification of wool. The Committee on Finance has received a response from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating that this report has been made to the House of Representatives; that it is very voluminous, and therefore he will not send a copy to the Senate without a special request. The committee have directed me to ask for an order that copies may be printed for the use of the Senate from the document now in the possession of the other House.

The order was read, and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 1,000 copies of House Executive Document No. 101, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, be printed for the use of the Senate; 200 copies to be for the use of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL. I submit the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, to be printed in the RECORD accompanying my remarks.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 12, 1884.

SIR: Respectfully referring to the Senate resolution of the 21st of January, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for copies of reports relating to the fraudulent undervaluation or classification of wool, I have the honor to state that several clerks have been employed during the last month in making copies of such reports for the use of the House of Representatives, in response to a resolution of that body dated January 9. These papers are very voluminous, and their preparation has required a large amount of labor. To avoid a duplication of such labor, and assuming that the papers will be printed by the House, I beg to inquire whether, in your opinion, an arrangement may not be made for the printing of a sufficient number of copies for the use of the Senate.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. J. FOLGER, Secretary.

Hon. J. S. MORRILL,
Chairman Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

Mr. SEWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back the bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, with amendments. I am also instructed to ask the Senate to take up this bill, or at least the Senate bill of the same title now on the Calendar, two weeks from to-morrow (March 12), at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey asks that the bills be made the special order for two weeks from to-morrow.

Mr. CONGER. Which bill does the Senator propose to make the special order?

Mr. SEWELL. The Senate bill on the Calendar.

Mr. HARRISON. There will have to be some special order, and I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that if he is asking for a special order he had better ask it for the bill that has just been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. He can just as well do that as to ask for the consideration of the Senate bill, for which he would have to substitute the House bill when he gets that up.

Mr. SEWELL. A simple motion would substitute the House bill for the Senate bill, but I will ask that the House bill be made the special order.

Mr. CONGER. Let both the Senate bill No. 158, Order of Business No. 96, and the House bill be made the special order at the same time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It requires a vote of two-thirds to make a special order. Shall the bill (H. R. 1015) just reported be made a special order for the time indicated? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONGER introduced a bill (S. 1637) to provide for the enlistment of apothecaries in the Navy, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1638) to provide for the leasing of the desert or arid lands of the public domain lying west of the one hundredth meridian of longitude; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1639) for the relief of the united bands of Swan Creek and Black River Chippewa and Munsee or Christian Indians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BLAIR. I introduce a bill to amend the pension laws by increasing the pensions of soldiers and sailors who have lost an arm or a leg, and for other disabilities contracted in the service. It becomes necessary to introduce this bill for the reason that there was an error in copying in a previous bill, which was consequently misprinted in such a way as to require this.

The bill (S. 1640) to amend the pension laws by increasing the pensions of soldiers and sailors who have lost an arm or a leg, and for other disabilities contracted in the service, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 1641) for the relief of the widow of Edward M. Wilkins; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DOLPH (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1642) to incorporate the Spokane Falls and Cœur d'Alene Railway Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 1643) amending the act concerning national cemeteries, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a bill (S. 1644) making an appropriation for the erection of a light-house on Conanicut Island, Narragansett Bay, Rhode Island; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 1646) to further continue the act to authorize the settlement of the accounts of officers of the Army and Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1647) to establish a chaplaincy of the jail and the institutions of charity and reform in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 1648) for the relief of Mrs. Sallie H. Palmer; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1649) for the relief of Theophilus Fisk Mills; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1650) to amend the pension laws by increasing the pensions of persons who have lost an arm or a leg, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate to print 24,000 additional copies of the Tariff Compilation of 1884, being Senate Report No. 12, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1490) to complete a statue of the late Rear-Admiral Samuel Francis Du Pont, United States Navy.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5262) to establish post-routes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. 58) filling an existing vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

LEASES OF LAND IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. MORGAN. By request I introduce a resolution, which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will first lay before the Senate a resolution which was submitted and objected to yesterday.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to have the resolution I sent up reported. I asked that it might be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a resolution introduced to-day.

Mr. MORGAN. It is a resolution which I have just introduced, and I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before receiving resolutions it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate resolutions that were objected to yesterday.

Mr. MORGAN. The consideration of which was objected to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The consideration of which was objected to.

Mr. MORGAN. I was not aware that that was the the rule. I supposed that we received business before we entered upon the consideration of business heretofore presented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The practice has been to act on the resolutions objected to on the previous day before receiving fresh resolutions.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not ask for the consideration of the resolution; I only ask that it be read and referred, so that I can get the substance of it before the appropriate committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay it before the Senate after the consideration of resolutions objected to yesterday. A resolution submitted yesterday and which went over will be read.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. VOORHEES was read, as follows:

Whereas, in compliance with Senate resolution of December 4, 1883, the honorable Secretary of the Interior has transmitted copies of documents and correspondence relating to leases of lands in the Indian Territory to citizens of the United States for cattle-grazing and other purposes; and

Whereas it appears from Executive Document No. 54, of the present session of Congress, containing said copies of correspondence, &c., that several millions of acres of land in the Indian Territory have been leased to citizens of the United States for cattle-grazing purposes: Therefore

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, instructed to investigate the matter of said leases; whether the same have been made in conformity to law; whether any money paid by any of the lessees under the terms of said leases have been covered into the Treasury; whether any of said lessees have attempted to survey any of the lands in said Indian Territory belonging, secured, or granted by treaty with the United States to any Indian tribe, or has designated any of the boundaries of said lands by marking trees or otherwise; and that said committee be instructed to report by bill or otherwise at any time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. GARLAND. I move to amend the resolution by striking out in the first line of the resolution proper the words "the Judiciary" and inserting the words "Indian Affairs;" so as to read:

That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, &c.

I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, to this matter. The scope of the resolution is very comprehensive, and before the inquiry that it seeks is completed it will pretty nearly involve the whole Indian question as we understand it in the relation of that country to the United States. It will not stop merely upon the matter of the leases. That is very plain upon the face of the resolution when it is closely read.

So I do not think that the Committee on the Judiciary is the proper committee to have this matter in charge. It is true the naked question of the law upon the leases that are supposed to have been granted there is a matter of legal inquiry which might properly go to the Judiciary Committee. That might be said, however, as to almost any inquiry before any other committee. However, it will not stop upon the mere question of the legality of the leases, but will go to many other questions that are interlocked and interlaced with the Indian question, so called. The Senator who introduced the resolution is not now in his seat, and I have not had occasion to speak with him upon it, but I think he would upon reflection agree to such a reference. I do not wish to have the resolution referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for investigation without the special attention of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs being called to it. I think it is a matter that should go to the committee of which he is chairman.

Mr. VEST. What the Senator from Arkansas has said is very true, and I entirely concur with him. I had occasion to examine the question of leases in the Indian Territory pretty extensively during the last summer. It is a question that, as the Senator from Arkansas says, goes into the entire relation of those Indian tribes with the Government and people of the United States. It is an anomaly in the legislation of the country and in the questions which present themselves with regard to the Indians.

As the matter now stands, there are thousands and millions of acres of land in the Indian Territory in the possession of cattle-raisers under leases made with the Indian authorities. Yet the Secretary of the Interior has authoritatively declared that he will not recognize any of those leases, that is to say, he will not approve them, although their entire territory is under the unlimited control and jurisdiction of the Indians. At the same time he has made a decision which has been published in the papers of the country extensively, that if a lease has been made by the Indian authorities and possession has been taken by the lessees under the lease he will see that the lessees are not interrupted in their possession. That is the condition of affairs to-day. Every session of the Indian councils, as they are called, or legislatures, results in additional leases, and the men who receive the leases or who get the bills through those councils take possession of the lands and put their cattle upon them. They hold by an authority outside of the United States but upon the soil of the United States. It is a question sui, I was about to say juris, but I do not know that there is any right in it at all. It is a question of itself; and for the reason that the Senator from Arkansas has given it is eminently proper that this inquiry should be directed to the Committee on Indian Affairs and that this matter should be settled definitely and finally, because I undertake to say as it stands now in its present nebulous and chaotic condition it will result in serious trouble and in complications the end and the extent of which can not now be foreseen. I hope the inquiry will go to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND].

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I think with the Senators who have addressed the Senate that this is a matter of very grave importance. It strikes me, however, that it is all a question of law. I do not think there can be any question in the Senate about the policy or propriety of this course of proceeding. The idea of appropriating those lands to herders of cattle and permitting them to inclose them with barbed-wire fences I do not think there can be any question about in the Senate of the United States. But the position of the lands themselves in relation to the United States is peculiar. They were sold by the Cherokee Nation to the United States by contract for a special purpose. The United States has declined to take and pay for them except so far as it desired to appropriate them for friendly Indians and freedmen, in the language of the treaty. It has left those that they did not desire to occupy under the control of the Indians of the Territory, the original proprietors, under the treaty. They have been in the habit heretofore of taking a royalty, so much per head, of herders who desired to use them for herding purposes, and they have been left to make these contracts heretofore by themselves. Within a few years a different policy has been adopted, as has been suggested by Senators. It involves the right either of the Indian authorities on the one side or of the United States on the other to the soil. That is a question growing out first of the treaty itself, and next out of that contract which was made by the United States with these Indians to purchase this land. That ought to be settled by the Judiciary Committee, it seems to me. The Senate does not want the advice of the Committee on Indian Affairs about the policy and propriety of permitting a few herders, a few stock-raisers, to form an association, and by any means whatever inclose the public domain with barbed-wire fence and appropriate it to their own use as they are doing on the public domain outside of this Territory. It is an outrage upon the common rights of the people of the United States that they do not want the advice of the Indian Committee on the propriety of. They want to know whether it is the legal right and duty of the United States to suppress this proceeding or whether it is a matter which under the treaty belongs entirely to the Indian nation.

It is evidently the opinion of the Interior Department that until the United States takes under the contract these lands for the use of friendly Indians and freedmen they are exclusively under the control of the Indians, and that they have a right to do this. I should like to know the opinion of the Judiciary Committee upon that point; I think the Senate would like to know it; and I do not think the Senate would hesitate a moment to express its own opinion when that is known.

The Indian Committee are not desirous of shirking any duty; they have a great deal to do which they can not shirk; and where the Judiciary Committee can properly relieve them, it is the desire of the committee that they should do it. It seems to me that the suggestions of this resolution are so peculiarly questions of law that the Judiciary Committee could well dispose of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, as I introduced the resolution, I wish to say that I am quite indifferent as to what committee shall take charge of this matter, though I thought when I introduced the resolution, and I still think, the Judiciary Committee the proper committee to pass upon the point suggested. While I should have no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, still I hope that it will not be adopted, but that the resolution will go to the committee first indicated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I hope that the amendment of my friend from Arkansas will be adopted. Having full sympathy with the objects of the resolution, I think it fairly belongs to the duty of the Committee on Indian Affairs to inquire into it. If we distribute the work in respect to the various topics in this body as it ought to be distributed to the committees relating to those affairs, clearly the Committee on Indian Affairs ought to undertake this work.

Besides that, I am sure Senators will remember that the Committee on the Judiciary has had referred to it already more subjects than it can possibly dispose of if it were to sit every day in the week in the hours that we can sit and sometimes during the sittings of the Senate. So I am very much afraid that if the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to undertake this work, we should be unable to obey the instruction, obeying earlier instructions, and undertake so much more other work. I hope therefore that my friend from Indiana will consent to the amendment in the interest of getting on with the inquiry and have the Committee on Indian Affairs undertake it.

Mr. VOORHEES. On the statement made by the Senator from Vermont, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, as to the business before that committee, I accept the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND].

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the preamble.

The preamble was agreed to.

JOURNAL OF RECONSTRUCTION COMMITTEE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate another resolution which comes over from yesterday.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, which was yesterday reported from the Committee on Printing by Mr. ANTHONY:

Resolved, That 6,000 copies of the journal of the joint committee of fifteen appointed in December, 1865, of which William Pitt Fessenden was chairman on the part of the Senate and Thaddeus Stevens on the part of the House, authorized "to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called Confederate States of America, and report whether they or any of them are entitled to be represented in either House of Congress, with leave to report at any time, by bill or otherwise," be printed; 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senators who objected to this resolution yesterday no longer object to it. I think it will pass unanimously.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE FREE STATES OF THE CONGO.

Mr. MORGAN. By request I offer the resolution which was sent to the Chair some time ago. Let it be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States in his message to Congress says that "The rich and populous valley of the Congo is being opened to commerce by a society called the International African Association, of which the King of the Belgians is the president and a citizen of the United States the chief executive officer. Large tracts of territory have been ceded to the association by native chiefs, roads have been opened, steamboats placed on the river, and the nuclei of states established at twenty-two stations under one flag, which offers freedom to commerce and prohibits the slave trade. The objects of the society are philanthropic. It does not aim at permanent political control, but seeks the neutrality of the valley. The United States can not be indifferent to this work nor to the interests of their citizens involved in it. It may become advisable for us to co-operate with other commercial powers in promoting the rights of trade and residence in the Congo Valley free from the interference or political control of any one nation:"

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States, That prompt action is recommended to the President toward securing unrestricted freedom of access and traffic to our citizens in their legitimate enterprises in the Congo Basin from its mouth to its sources:

1. By taking such measures as may be necessary to assure protection to our citizens and their trade in the territories called the Free States of the Congo, acquired from native chiefs by the committee of the Upper Congo; and under the flag of the African International Association, freedom from customs dues, the right to trade, to reside, and acquire property, whether as traders or missionaries, freedom of religious belief, and freedom from the slave trade.

2. By reasserting and applying the policy of previous administrations, denying rights of sovereignty and of intervention by any power, great or small, to the mouth of the Congo, the gateway of Central Africa; and by taking such steps, in concert with other commercial powers, as shall assure freedom of passage by land and water through that region, unrestrained by any impositions, to all people in their legitimate pursuits; and which shall prevent the further deportation therefrom of Africans for forced labor in any form.

Mr. MORGAN. As I stated, I have been requested to present that resolution to the Senate. I do it with pleasure, because the suggestions contained in it seem to be very valuable, and it presents the question of the Senate acting separately from the House on a matter of request or advice to the President, and it also modifies and changes some of the views of my own which I presented in the resolution I offered yesterday, which went to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I ask that this resolution take the same reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and printed.

PANAMA SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to furnish the Senate with all information on file in the Navy Department respecting the progress of the work in the construction of a ship-canal at the Isthmus of Panama.

AMENDMENTS TO THE RULES.

Mr. HARRIS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the seventh rule of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following words:

"The presiding officer may at any time lay, and it shall be in order at any time for a Senator to move to lay, before the Senate any bill or other matter sent to the Senate by the President or the House of Representatives, and any question pending at that time shall be suspended for this purpose. Any motion so made shall be determined without debate."

Mr. HARRIS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the eighth rule of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following words:

"All motions made before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate."

PRINTING OF A REPORT.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to ask for the present consideration of the following order:

Ordered, That one hundred additional copies of Senate Report No. 12, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, be printed and bound, interleaved, for the use of the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask for its present consideration. It only provides for one hundred copies.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest that as it asks for the printing of extra copies, it will have to go to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The statute requires that all motions to print extra copies shall go to the Committee on Printing.

GIFT OF STEAMSHIP ALERT.

Mr. HALE. I ask consent to make a report at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will receive it unless there be objection.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom a message of the President of the United States on the subject was referred, reported a joint resolution (S. R. 70) expressing the appreciation of Congress and the people of the United States of the generous act of Her Britannic Majesty's Government in presenting to the United States the Arctic steamship Alert.

The joint resolution was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act of Her Britannic Majesty's Government in presenting to the United States the Arctic steamship Alert, which will be used in the contemplated expedition to relieve Lieutenant Greely and his party, is recognized as opportune and generous, and is deeply appreciated by the Congress and people of the United States. That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate a copy of this resolution to Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

Mr. PLUMB submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Agriculture be, and he hereby is, directed to furnish this body at his earliest convenience—

First. The annual amount of wheat, rye, corn, and cotton produced in this country during the five crop years preceding 1882; the amount used at home for food, fodder, seed, and other purposes; the amount exported abroad, with the surplus, if any, at the end of said crop years, each respectively.

Second. The amount produced in the crop year 1882; the amount and uses to which they were applied at home; the amount exported abroad, with the surplus, if any, in this country at the end of that crop year, each respectively.

Third. The amount produced in 1883; the amount already consumed at home, with the requirements in this country, and for what purposes, to the end of that crop year; the amount already exported, and the amount available for export before the crops of 1884 are ready to market, each respectively.

Fourth. The condition of crops now in the ground, with the extent and character of injury to the crops of 1883, each respectively.

Fifth. Whether, in his judgment, speculations in options or futures in these products, where no actual transfer of the property takes place, tends to influence its market value to the injury of producers or consumers.

FILE OF CALENDAR BILLS.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, it would conduce greatly to the convenience of Senators, and I think also to the dispatch of the public business, if there could be placed upon each Senator's desk a file of bills reported from committees and upon the Calendar. As our files now are, we have no means of knowing day by day what the condition of the bills that have been reported from committees is, unless by sending to the document-room. The first print is placed on our tables, and we find it here in the morning, and at the close of every session it is dispersed into the waste-baskets; but the reports that are made by committees, the bills as they are amended, do not appear in connected succession in any way so that they are accessible during the morning hour when the Calendar is under consideration.

I will move that the proper officer—I do not know whose business it is, but I suppose the Secretary of the Senate—be directed to prepare or have prepared for each Senator a file of bills upon the Calendar, with the reports of committees relating thereto, so that when these cases come up in the morning hour we may have at our desks the means of reference to the cases that are called.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the Senator desire to have the entire Calendar each morning placed on his table?

Mr. INGALLS. I mean a file of the bills upon the Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY. The entire Calendar?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. And also the reports?

Mr. INGALLS. All the reports, so that we shall have the means of intelligently understanding the cases as they come up and learning how the bills have been reported from the committees, and also have means of access to the reports of the committees.

Mr. HAWLEY. Unless the Senators will preserve them from day to day, the renewal of such a collection would exhaust the usual number printed before we got to the end of the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The point is to preserve a file of calendar bills and just add to it daily.

Mr. INGALLS. Add to it from day to day as the bills come in from committees, so that we shall have a regular file on our desks of the bills as they appear on the Calendar; and that is the only file that can be of any service to us in the consideration of our daily business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

The motion was agreed to.

CALIFORNIA SCHOOL LANDS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business having been concluded the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII. The first bill in order will be reported.

The bill (S. 1024) to authorize the State of California to select other lands in place of sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections returned as mineral was announced as first in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I move as a substitute for all of the bill after the enacting clause what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment to the text of the bill proposed by the Committee on Public Lands, which should be first acted on with a view of perfecting the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. Very well.

The amendment reported from the Committee on Public Lands was, in section 1, line 3, after the word "select," to insert "from the unoccupied surveyed lands within the State;" so as to make the section read:

That the State of California shall have the right to select from the unoccupied surveyed public lands within the State an equal quantity of other lands in lieu of such sixteenth and thirth-sixth sections in said State as are returned as mineral land by the United States deputy surveyors or are reserved as mineral land by the United States; and such sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections shall thereupon be subject to disposal by the United States as other land of like character.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] as a substitute will now be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That an act entitled "An act to provide for the survey of the public lands in California, the granting of pre-emption rights therein, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1853, shall be construed as giving to the State of California the right to select for school purposes other lands in lieu of such sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections as may have been or shall be found to be mineral lands: Provided, That such indemnity selections shall be made under the limitations contained in said act from the surveyed public lands of the United States in the State of California subject to entry under the general laws, and not mineral, nor occupied by actual settlers, nor reserved for any purpose, nor appropriated under any law of the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. With the exception of a slight amendment, that is precisely the bill which was reported from the Committee on Public Lands last year for this purpose. It is not amenable to the objection which has been made to the bill reported this year, which permitted the selection of lands in any portion of the State. This amendment limits the selection to the land districts in which the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections have been found to be mineral lands, and consequently in which a claim for indemnity has arisen. It obviates the complaint that has been made about the scope and effect of the bill as reported from the committee at this session.

Mr. GARLAND. Is this amendment authorized by the committee?

Mr. PLUMB. It is not authorized by the committee, but it was submitted to me by the Senator from California as acceptable to him, he having introduced the bill. It was before the committee, and it was a question of comparative indifference which measure was taken, but finally an agreement was made to take the one reported at a former session, and this I now offer as simply the expression of the committee at the last session, which does cover the point of objection which has been raised, and I think well raised, to the original bill of this session.

Mr. GARLAND. The language in the early part of the amendment that the act referred to shall be construed to mean so and so is a matter for the courts and for the Department. We do not put in now that laws shall be construed to mean so and so. Sometimes we say it was the intention of an act to mean so and so. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas to put that in, to say that it was the intention of the act, but not say it shall be construed in such and such a manner.

Mr. PLUMB. It will answer the same purpose. It was undoubtedly supposed at the time that it would permit the selection of indemnity lands, but the Department decided otherwise. I have no objection to accepting the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas that it was the intention of the act described to permit such selection.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas is a good one, and I shall be glad to see those words inserted. The bill as reported from the committee met my approval, for I believed it was right and proper, but objections were made of the character which the Senator from Kansas has explained, and I have been willing to consent, therefore, that the bill reported from the committee last session, and against which there can be no objection raised, be substituted for the bill on the Calendar.

The bill was introduced at the request of the governor, the attorney-general, and the superintendent of public instruction of the State of California, and of the surveyor-general. It was drafted I believe by the attorney-general of the State of California. I introduced it in compliance with that request, and it was reported by the committee with a slight amendment. Since then objection has been raised, principally because it permitted these lieu lands to be taken in any part of the State of California and not confined to the last district in which the reservations were made. I do not see any force in that objection, but since it has been made, I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 6 of the amendment it is proposed to strike out the words "shall be construed as giving" and insert "was intended to give."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NEW HAVEN.

The Senate, as in the Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 233) providing for the enlargement and improvement of the post-office, custom-house, and court-house at New Haven, Conn. It proposes to appropriate $50,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury in enlarging and improvement of the Government building at New Haven, Conn., used as a post-office, custom-house, and court-house.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there a report? If not, we should have an explanation why this should be done. Why is there any necessity for this legislation?

Mr. PLATT. The chairman of the committee [Mr. MAHONE], who reported the bill, is not here, and I believe no written report was made, but I know personally the necessity which arises for this appropriation.

The building, in which are situated the post-office, the custom-house, and the United States court-house in New Haven, was built more than thirty years ago. The population of New Haven has doubled during that time, and it has now come to pass that the rooms assigned for the post-office, being the first floor and the basement, are utterly inadequate for the transaction of the business of the office. I am familiar with it myself; and if the Senator from Missouri would step into that office he would see at a glance that it was impossible properly to conduct the business of the post-office within the room which it can have at present in that building, so much so that the postmaster has at his own expense built a wooden annex to the building, which is of freestone, in which much material, such as pouches, and other things that are used in the post-office, is stored of necessity. That is subject to fire or to burglary, and the room is entirely inadequate for the purposes of the business. There is plenty of vacant space back of the building, and the proposition is to enlarge by building in the vacant space one story high, with a glass roof, just to spend money enough to get what room is needed to transact the business of the post-office.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUNISHMENT OF BIGAMY.

The bill (S. 1283) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," approved March 22, 1882, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] who is now absent reported that bill. I ask that it be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice, if there be no objection.

TAXATION OF RAILROAD LANDS.

The bill (S. 60) to declare certain lands subject to taxation was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That all the lands granted by the act of July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," and the act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1864, to the several railroad companies therein named, which have been selected and surveyed, and to which said companies respectively have become entitled to receive patents upon payment of the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same, as provided by section 21 of said amendatory act of July 2, 1864, notwithstanding such company have not made such payment, shall be subject to all legal taxes imposed under authority of any State or Territory in which such lands are located, to the same extent as they would have been had such costs been paid and the lands conveyed to said railroad companies: Provided, That this act shall not be construed as applying to lands already forfeited by said railroad companies, or either of them, nor shall it operate to relieve any such company from any forfeiture heretofore incurred: And provided further, That prior to the payment of such costs of surveying by said railroad companies no taxes shall be imposed except in organized counties.

SEC. 2. That in any sale of such lands for taxes the moneys due or to become due the United States under said acts for such costs, fees, &c., shall be and remain a first lien on such lands, and shall be paid by the purchaser at such tax-sale, who shall thereupon, his title under the tax-sale being complete, receive a patent for the land so purchased by him, and which patent shall operate only as an evidence of the tax-title, which title shall be subject and subordinate to all the rights of the United States in respect of such lands growing out of the lien and security on such lands created in respect of the subsidy bonds issued by the United States in aid of the construction of said railroads, which facts and reservations shall be stated in such patents.

SEC. 3. That any railroad company or its assigns to which lands have been granted under the provisions of the said act of July 1, 1862, and the act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1864, referred to in section 1 of this act, shall, within ninety days from the passage of this act, pay into the Treasury of the United States all the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying all such lands upon which such costs shall not have been already paid.

SEC. 4. That in the event of failure by any such company, or its assigns, to comply fully with the provisions of section 1 of this act, the Secretary of the Interior shall immediately give notice to the president or treasurer of said company that he is ready to deliver to the company, or its assigns, a patent or patents for all the tracts or parcels of land to which the company would be legally entitled if said costs of surveying, selecting, and conveying had been paid, whenever the said costs are paid by it or its assigns; and if said company, or its assigns, shall not, within two months of said notice, pay such costs and accept such patent or patents, then and thereupon the Secretary of the Interior shall notify the Attorney-General of the United States of such failure, and of the amount of such costs, as nearly as may be; whereupon the Attorney-General of the United States is authorized and directed to institute forthwith, in the name of the United States of America, in the circuit court of the United States for the district in which said tracts or parcels of land are situated, any and all proceedings against said company necessary and proper to secure the payment of all said costs, and of the further cost of all such legal proceedings, for which the United States shall have a prior lien.

SEC. 5. That on and after the date of the above notification to any such company by the Secretary of the Interior of tender of patent as aforesaid, all tracts and parcels of land to which such company would be legally entitled upon the payment of said costs shall be subject to any and all legal taxes imposed under authority of the laws of the States or Territories in which the said lands are located, to the same extent that they would have been if such costs had been paid and the lands conveyed to such company or its assigns.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. GARLAND January 29, 1884:

The Committee on the Judiciary have had under consideration the bill (S. 60) to declare certain lands subject to taxation, and they report the same back with several amendments, with the recommendation that the bill as amended pass; and the committee beg leave to report specifically.

The original bill contemplates subjecting the lands granted by the act of July 1, 1862, and the acts amendatory thereof, to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, &c., to all legal taxes imposed under authority of any State or Territory in which such lands are located, to the same extent as they would have been had the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same been paid.

The committee are of opinion this is too broad, and, if adopted, would lead to much confusion and sometimes to great injustice. While it is true by the well-established rule of law these grants are in præsenti—vesting title immediately—making the performance of any conditions attached relate back to the date of the grant (Baldwin's case, 103 U. S. Rep., p. 426; Van Wyke's case, 106 Ib., p. 360; McLaughlin's case, 107 Ib., p. 526), yet the full performance of these conditions so as to vest title absolutely and the relative duties and obligations of the General Government, the railroad companies, and of the States and Territories in which the lands are situate are not so clearly and definitely ascertained.

The Supreme Court of the United States (Prescott's case, 16 Wallace, page 603), in passing upon the acts named in this bill, seem to have held these lands could not be taxed as contemplated by this bill; that the title still remaining in the Government, a tax sale of any of the lands would vest no title. This leaves the lands to be used and speculated on by the railroad companies until they see fit to perfect title, and at the same time prevents their being disposed of by the General Government for homestead or other purposes, and the States and Territories in which they lie can not derive any revenue from them. To meet these difficulties, the committee think it best to limit the taxation of these lands to such as have been selected and surveyed, as then all is done by the companies that is needed to have patents issued; and this being done, according to the ruling in Prescott's case, the lands are taxable. The companies are then, by proposed amendments, required to pay into the Treasury of the United States, within ninety days from the passage of the act, all the costs of surveying, selecting, and conveying; and in case of failure of the companies to make these payments, the Secretary of the Interior must serve notice on them that he is ready to deliver patents upon lands to which the companies are entitled, if such costs were paid; and if, after two months' service of such notice, they fail to pay such costs and accept patents, the Attorney-General of the United States is required to institute proper proceedings in the courts of the United States against such companies to secure the payment of all said costs and the costs of such proceedings, and for these the United States shall have a prior lien.

After this notification by the Secretary of the Interior all tracts of land to which the companies would be legally entitled upon payment of such costs will be subject to all legal taxes under the authority of the States and Territories in which they are located, and to the same extent that they would have been if such costs had been paid and the lands actually conveyed.

The committee think this proceeding will bring about a selection of the lands included in the grant, or an abandonment of many of them by the companies, and relieve the difficulties now arising out of the strange condition in which these lands are.

Ample time and opportunity are given the companies, and no injustice is done them; while the Government is protected in its rights and saved harmless in all it is called upon to do. While the committee could not consent to do violence against the true intent and meaning of the grant, yet they can not agree to have these lands as they are now, to be selected or not by the companies as they might see fit. Out of the great number of acres contained in these grants probably not one-fortieth have been selected so as to separate them actually from the public domain.

In any tax sale under this bill the Government preserves her first lien on the lands for all proper costs, fees, &c., and when a patent issues upon any tax sale, it operates only as an evidence of the tax title, and that title shall be subject and subordinate to all the rights of the Government in respect of the subsidy bonds issued by it in aid of the construction of such roads, and these facts and reservations are required to be stated in such patents.

With these provisions the committee feel that this vexed, and heretofore troublesome, question will be concluded without any injustice to any party concerned.

Mr. PLUMB. The original bill was introduced by myself. It is in substance the bill that has passed the Senate heretofore. I am not able to give my consent to the amendment proposed by the Judiciary Committee, and before that amendment is acted upon I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas who reported it what he deems to be the meaning of the word "selected," in line 10 of the amendment.

Mr. GARLAND. If the bill that is now before the Senate elicits any opposition it will require more time than the rule allows under a five-minute debate to consider it, and in fact it will take more time than from now until 2 o'clock to-day, because the question propounded by the Senator from Kansas opens up the whole matter in reference to the history of these grants and the proceeding of the companies in perfecting title to these lands and the construction placed by the courts upon them. It is a very important bill, and one that should be disposed of by the Senate one way or the other. It has given the committee a great deal of trouble in investigating it.

In answering the question of the Senator from Kansas, I propose to enter somewhat at large into the discussion of the bill generally. We had better come to some understanding as to when it shall be taken up. The report has just been read. It should be taken up outside of the limit imposed on debate by the rule which now applies.

Mr. PLUMB. What does the Senator from Arkansas propose in reference to the date when it shall be considered?

Mr. GARLAND. I propose to take it up immediately after the bill now pending under the control and management of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I should like to have that understanding if the Senate agrees to it. This is a matter that should be disposed of, but we cannot dispose of it under the five-minute rule.

Mr. PLATT. Is this bill any more important than some of the other bills which stand upon the Calendar of General Orders? Of course I am not informed about the necessity of considering this bill; but I know that there are bills which have passed to the Calendar of General Orders which are important. As we have no special order now after the one relating to the Navy until two weeks from to-day, I had hoped that we might dispose of the important business which stands on the Calendar to be proceeded with after 2 o'clock. I should very much dislike to have this bill take its place as a special order immediately after the naval bill is disposed of, and I think if the Senators who are interested in it will let it go upon the Calendar of General Orders it will be reached at no distant day.

I do not make formal objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas, but I hardly think that he ought to ask that this bill be made a special order to come in after the present order is disposed of.

Mr. GARLAND. Then I will let this bill pass over informally and notify the Senate that the first time I get an opportunity I will call it up.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to its going over if it can go over to some time and in some way whereby it can be discussed and decided intelligently.

Mr. GARLAND. That is what I want.

Mr. PLUMB. It is a bill that ought to be considered at a very early day, and I hope the difference of views in regard to it is not so radical that it cannot be reconciled. Certainly it should be disposed of when taken up, at all events. A bill of similar purport has passed the Senate twice. It is designed to remedy a very crying evil. While I am not able to agree with the Judiciary Committee in regard to the amendment that they have proposed, I certainly am anxious that the entire subject shall be disposed of as early as possible. I hope the amendment of the committee will be voted down when the matter is considered.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I was not able to give my entire consent to the conclusions of the Judiciary Committee in their action upon this bill, but I assented to the report of the amendment because it appeared to be the best that could at that time be accomplished.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] suggests that the bill may not have sufficient importance to warrant its assignment as a special order after the naval bill is disposed of. The Senator of course is not aware of the condition of a very large proportion of the territory of what are known as the homestead States and Territories of the West and Northwest or I am very sure he would not have been made the remark that he did make.

The practical operation is this: The different railroad companies that have become entitled to grants of land under previous acts of Congress refuse to have them surveyed and patented and thus segregated from the great mass of the public domain, so that they can become liable to taxation. The consequence is that in many counties in the State of Kansas, in many others in the State of Nebraska, and in large portions of the organized Territories of the Northwest there are communities that are deprived of the means of support in consequence of the refusal of the railroads to take out patents for the land to which they claim themselves to be entitled under the acts of Congress. Of course States can not be permitted to tax lands the title to which is in the Government of the United States; and this is a measure to compel the roads to pay the cost of surveying and take out titles to the lands which they claim or else forfeit them, so that the States and Territories where these lands lie may be permitted to have these lands entered by homestead and pre-emption settlers or else taxed to the railroads to carry on the affairs of local self-government.

I hope, Mr. President, that the Senator will not interpose any objection, but will agree that this measure, of such great and vital importance to a very large proportion of my constituents and of the constituents of other gentlemen representing the North and Northwest, may be allowed to be considered at an early day.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Kansas will bear me witness that I did not make any formal objection, but knowing that other Senators from the newer sections of the country were more informed on this subject than myself, I made the remarks which I did in the nature of inquiry for information. The matter which I had in my mind as not desiring to have postponed unduly by these special orders is one in which I think the Senator from Kansas is interested, and that is a bill which stands now fourth on the Calendar of General Orders, a bill to amend section 4919 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the recovery of damages for the infringement of patents.

The only object or purpose which I had in making the remarks that I did make was to try to preserve that bill in a place where we might get early action upon it. If Senators deem that this bill is so important that it should be made a special order I shall interpose no objection, but I will call upon the Senator from Kansas at no distant day to help me to get consideration for the bill of which I speak.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator shall have my hearty co-operation.

Mr. GARLAND. On the statements made all around I shall let this bill go upon the Calendar under Rule IX, and if there be any difficulty when it is reached, I think the Senate can accommodate matters so as to have it considered. This bill will take some time, and we might as well settle it once for all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill will be reported.

WILLIAM T. PATE & CO.

The bill (S. 528) for the relief of Silas Q. Howe, surviving partner of William T. Pate & Co., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Silas Q. Howe, surviving partner of William T. Pate & Co., of Patriot, Ind., of $19,385, being the amount due them for taxes paid the 16th of March, 1867, on distilled spirits which had already paid the tax required by law.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have simply to say that this bill was reported by me from the Committee on Finance, which committee has on two occasions unanimously approved the bill. It has also received the approval of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House. There is a report on file, which is of some length, but which I shall have read if any Senator desires. If the reading is not desired, I ask for action on the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to have a statement of the case or that the report be read.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then let the report be read. That is the best statement that can be made.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. VOORHEES, from the Committee on Finance, January 29, 1884:

The facts in this case are substantially these: The petitioners were licensed distillers at Patriot, Ind., and had carried on that business on a large scale for many years. In the month of February, 1867, Mr. Reed, a revenue detective, made a report to the collector of the third Indiana district—

	Gallons.	Gallons.
1. That said firm had sold from September 1 to December 31, 1866, of distilled spirits (see evidence, page 98)		197,894.50
From their sales he deducted:
2. Tax-paid spirits on hand September 1, 1866 (see page 98)	3,650
3. Taxes paid on spirits from September 1 to December 31, 1866	184,552
		188,202.00
Alleging a deficit of		9,692.50

Making a tax, at $2 a gallon, of $19,385.

Upon this report being made, the collector of said district seized the distillery, and the assessor assessed said sum against Pate & Co. without investigation of the facts. The petitioners, after the seizure of their distillery, paid the money on the 16th day of March, 1867, under protest, and in April, 1867, made application to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for a release of their distillery and a repayment of the money, stating in their application that the tax was wrongfully assessed and collected; that the report of Mr. Reed was incorrect; that said sum ought to be refunded, for the reasons—

	Gallons.
1. That their sales of distilled spirits from September 1 to December 31, 1866, were (see page 77)	211,798.00
2. That they had on hand September 1, 1866, of tax-paid distilled spirits (see page 77)	16,045.00
3. That the taxes paid by them on spirits from September 1 to December 31, 1866, were on	132,211.28
4. That they removed in bond (same period)	63,716.00
5. Paid alleged deficit March 16, 1867	9,692.50
Making total taxes paid	221,664.78
Deduct sales as above	211,798.00
Making erroneously paid (see page 77, printed evidence)	9,866.78

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, upon the receipt of the application made by claimants, released their distillery, but refused to refund the money. He appointed another revenue agent to make an investigation of the facts, and this agent, after an examination of the matter, reported them to be as the claimants had stated, and said, among other things in his report, that—

"Mr. Pate is a man of large means and good credit (see page 83). I found nothing that looked like fraud in my investigations; everything is properly arranged about the distillery (see page 83).

"I am firmly convinced that great wrong has been done Mr. Pate. He has been greatly damaged in his business and injured in his reputation (see page 81).

"I respectfully but urgently recommend that Mr. Pate's distillery be released from seizure as soon as possible, and such other steps taken as your sense of justice shall dictate (see page 82)."

The assistant assessor of said district says:

"I hereby certify that I have carefully investigated the facts in the within affidavit of Silas Q. Howe and William T. Pate, of date of April 13, 1867, and from my own personal knowledge of said parties and investigations made I am fully satisfied that the same are in every respect true as therein set forth. I verily believe that the amount paid, $19,385, with the penalties, ought immediately to be refunded.

"JAMES H. TITUS,
"Assistant Assessor Third District Indiana.

"VEVAY, April 13, 1867."
(See page 104 of evidence.)

The late assistant assessor of said district says:

"I have carefully investigated the facts set forth in the affidavit of Silas Q. Howe and William T. Pate, of the firm of W. T. Pate & Co., and am satisfied that the facts as therein stated are in all respects just and true; that from my personal knowledge of the members of said firm and their high standing and position as men of business for truth and integrity, and the thorough investigations I have made of their books in 1862, 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, I have found no fraud upon their part, and always believed none was committed. I am satisfied from the present investigation that said distillery ought to be released, and that said sum paid by them ought in justice to be refunded, together with all penalties.

"JOHN F. DOAN,
"Late Assistant Assessor Eighth Division Third District Indiana.

"VEVAY, April 13, 1867."
(See page 100.)

The deputy collector of said district says:

"I hereby certify that I have carefully investigated the facts in the affidavit of William T. Pate and Silas Q. Howe, of date of April 13, 1867, and that I fully believe the statements to be in all respects just and true, and that in justice to said Pate & Co. their distillery at Patriot, Ind., ought to be released, as I am fully satisfied that there was no fraud committed by them upon the revenue, as alleged by Alexander Reed, revenue agent; and that the sum of $19,385 and all penalties should be immediately refunded.

"Witness my name and official seal this 13th day of April, 1867.

"Deputy Collector Seventh Division Third District Indiana."
(See page 101.)

Another deputy collector of said district says:

UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE,
DEPUTY COLLECTOR'S OFFICE,
Third District Indiana, May 8, 1869.

I hereby certify that I have carefully investigated the facts set forth in the affidavit of W. T. Pate and Silas Q. Howe, and the Exhibit A therein referred to, and find the same to be in all respects just and true as therein set forth; * * * that the quantity, paid taxes, and removal in bond exceed their sales by 9,866.96 gallons; and that the sum of $19,385, the tax on 9,692½ gallons, should be refunded, as it has been twice assessed and paid the tax.

R. F. T. ABBOTT,
Deputy Collector.
(See page 61.)

The collector for said district says:

"I hereby certify that I have carefully investigated the facts in the within affidavit, and am satisfied that the statements are in all respects just and true, and I further certify, upon personal examination, that the name of the claimants and the amounts claimed are found reported on page 1, line 1, of the lists of form 93, for September and October, 1866, and again reported on page 1, line 9, of the list of form 23, of February, 1867, now on file in my office, and the same was paid on the 17th and 24th of September, 20th of October, 1866, and again paid on the 16th day of March, 1867, and is included in the aggregate receipts for said lists, the receipts amounting to $251,800, and delivered to the assessor to be transmitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and has not been allowed in any form. Dated May 29, 1869.

"SMITH JONES,
"Collector Third District, Indiana."
(See page 61.)

The assessor of said district also certifies to the correctness of the facts as stated by Pate & Co. (See page 61.)

There is a great deal of other evidence in the record not necessary to be stated here, as it merely corroborates that of the assessors, collectors, and deputy collectors and assistant assessors. Upon this testimony, and after a very careful examination of all the facts and figures contained in the voluminous record before us, the committee are of the opinion that there was an erroneous assessment and collection of the tax on 9,692½ gallons of spirits, and that it ought to be refunded. We therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask the Senate to finish the bill on which we are engaged. It will take but a little while.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks consent to go on with the pending case.

Mr. HALE. How long will it take?

Mr. VOORHEES. It ought not to take five minutes. The Senator from Kansas called for the reading of the report.

Mr. INGALLS. I merely asked for a statement of the facts on which the bill was reported. I did not ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. VOORHEES. Perhaps I ought to have made a brief statement, but the report was so full and conclusive that I thought its reading would be more satisfactory.

Mr. HALE. I will not object if it takes no more time than is stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to continuing the consideration of the bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. This case has been well considered and has passed the Committee on Finance twice. I only ask for the action of the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 186) for the relief of Frank Galt; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ADDITIONAL STEEL VESSELS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair now lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (S. 698) to authorize the construction of additional steel vessels for the Navy.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the bill, as reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, be read. It is not long.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The amendments reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs were in section 1, line 12, after the word "and," to strike out "two" and insert "one;" in line 13, after the word "light," to strike out "gunboats" and insert "gunboat;" and in the same line, after the word "tons," to strike out "each" and insert:

And one gunboat, not to exceed nine hundred tons, to be built on plans and specifications to be furnished by the Admiral of the Navy, and under his supervision and directions, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Navy.

So as to read:

That the President is hereby authorized to direct the construction of seven steel vessels for the Navy of the United States, as recommended in the report of the naval advisory board dated October 25, 1883, and in the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy of December 1, 1883, as follows: One cruiser of 4,500 tons displacement, one cruiser of 3,000 tons, one dispatch vessel of 1,500 tons, two heavily-armed gunboats of 1,500 tons each, and one light gunboat of 750 tons, and one gunboat not to exceed 900 tons, to be built on plans and specifications to be furnished by the Admiral of the Navy, and under his supervision and directions, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Navy.

SEC. 2. That the President is further authorized to direct the construction of one steel ram, as recommended by the first naval advisory board, November 7, 1881; of one cruising torpedo-boat, advocated by the same board and by the present advisory board in its memorandum of November 21, 1882; and of two of the harbor torpedo-boats recommended by said first board and in the report from the Bureau of Ordnance of November 1, 1883; all of which are recommended in the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Navy of the United States, its condition, its efficiency, in view of any possible or probable complication with other nations, or as a representative of the power of this country wherever its commerce is now found or may be found in the years to come, presents a subject which has been growing in importance for years.

It has been seen that as we have receded from the time of the war of the rebellion the great naval force which was by necessity then called into being has gradually but surely diminished, and that not much has been done by Congress in the way of replacing the war navy of the United States with new, good ships, built after the fashion of the best approved modern naval construction.

Different administrations of the Navy Department have found the old wooden war vessels upon their hands, and have been obliged, out of the ordinary annual appropriations for the running of the Department, to take money enough to repair these old ships and keep them afloat upon the waters of the globe.

In a few instances special appropriations have been made for emergencies, as in the case of the threatened rupture with Spain in 1873, and a few new ships have been built from money specifically appropriated therefor; but in the main the Navy of the United States for almost twenty years has been kept in such condition of efficiency as it was possible out of moneys taken from the ordinary running appropriations made annually for the general uses of the Department.

During this time other great powers of the world have rejected and abandoned their old ships, have built in their places new ones, have tried experiment after experiment in relation to the structure and armament of naval ships, and, after spending millions and tens of millions of dollars, are found to-day with great fleets of formidable cruising and fighting war ships.

Of such as these the United States to-day has hardly one, and yet should any trouble with any foreign power arise, as it may, and the property and lives of American citizens should be found helplessly and hopelessly at the mercy of any foe possessing not one-tenth of our wealth and power but armed with half a dozen modern war ships with a modern war armament, the American people would be loath to forgive any administration or any party or any public man that had contributed actively or had by silence allowed the Republic to fall into this defenseless condition.

The bill which I have reported, and which is now before the Senate, is an effort to in some degree prevent this. I have but one apology to make for it, and that is that in my judgment it does not under all existing circumstances go half far enough; but the committee has thought it wise, and in this conclusion I join to report a bill covering a moderate expenditure of money for the purpose of testing the sense of Congress upon this most important and pressing subject.

The bill provides for the construction of seven new steel vessels for the Navy of the United States of the following descriptions and classes: One cruiser of 4,500 tons displacement, one cruiser of 3,000 tons, one dispatch vessel of 1,500 tons, two heavily-armed gunboats of 1,500 tons each, one gunboat of 750 tons, and one gunboat, not to exceed 900 tons, to be built on plans and specifications to be furnished by the Admiral of the Navy.

It provides further for the construction of one steel ram, of one cruising torpedo-boat, and of two harbor torpedo-boats.

I am glad to say that this is not the first step taken in building up the American Navy. By the act of March 3, 1883, the construction of one large steel cruiser, of the class provided for first in this bill, two cruisers of the 3,000-ton class, and one dispatch-boat was authorized.

The questions arising as to the construction of these ships, their models and plans, their machinery and their armament, were all important and difficult to be settled. It was comparatively a new and untried field. The Secretary of the Navy, exercising a discretion and wisdom which I commend, left these matters largely to the naval advisory board which Congress had provided for. No step in the construction of the ships which are now building—the Chicago, the Boston, the Atlanta, and the Dolphin—has been taken without the fullest supervision and inspection and approval of this board. The classes and types were such as have been recommended by the naval advisory board of 1881, which board, in an elaborate report which I shall be glad to have Senators read, presented the whole subject of the condition of the American Navy, its needs and wants and a plan for reconstructing it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Would it interfere with the Senator if I were to ask him a question in this connection?

Mr. HALE. No, sir.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Do I understand the honorable Senator to say that the recommendations of the advisory board of 1881, appointed under Secretary Hunt, have been followed by the second and present advisory boards?

Mr. HALE. No, I do not say that. I say that the classes and types of ships that are now being constructed—the Chicago, the Atlanta, &c.—were such as were reported upon favorably by that board. The board went further, and provided for or recommended the construction of other classes of ships larger and more expensive, but these are included in the recommendations of that board.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If I understand the Senator aright, if I may again interrupt him, as to the size of the ships as recommended by the two boards he is to a certain extent correct, although the first board recommended a larger ship than any under construction by this board; but as to all other things connected with the ships themselves, I think there is a vast difference between the recommendations of the first board and the recommendations of the second board under whose recommendations vessels are now being built.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will bear in mind that I confined my statement to these ships being of the class or type. As to the details of their construction, that matter fell upon another advisory board, of which I shall speak.

The naval advisory board of 1881 having investigated this subject and made the elaborate report to which I have referred was succeeded by the naval advisory board of 1882, and I wish that Senators would look into the make-up of these advisory boards. Upon both of these boards have been placed some of the oldest and wisest officers of the Navy, joined with younger men who have rendered service in ships propelled by the power which is mainly in use in all ships to-day. To these were joined experts in marine architecture and construction. The reports of these boards, made from time to time and covering the entire range of the subject-matter, will be found accompanying the last annual report of the Secretary of the Navy, where this whole question is most exhaustively treated.

The cruisers, the dispatch-boat, and the gunboats provided for in this bill are recommended by the naval advisory board in its report dated October 25, 1883.

The ram and torpedo-boats are such as are recommended by the first advisory board, November 7, 1881. The larger vessels are of the same class and type of those now building.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, before coming to a conclusion upon this bill, held many and prolonged sessions and summoned to its assistance not only the Secretary of the Navy and the members of the advisory board, but distinguished and eminent officers in the service, who were requested to give the committee, for the benefit of Congress, their views upon the kinds of ships best adapted to the needs of our Navy. This testimony has all been printed for the use of Congress, and all that had been taken up to the date when the bill was reported is found in the document which I hold in my hand accompanying the report of the committee. Other testimony and views have been taken and since printed.

It has not been found possible to adopt any model or type of war vessel that will suit everybody. The committee has found that officers of the Navy possessing skill, intelligence, and with long experience differ as to details of construction. Vexing questions have arisen as to hull models, as to deck protection, as to machinery, as to the manner in which the hulls shall be built or protected; but the committee has been gratified to find generally a marked unanimity of sentiment among naval officers in favor of the kinds of vessels now building and provided for in this bill. It refers to the testimony of the Secretary of the Navy, the members of the advisory board, the Admiral of the Navy, Rear-Admiral Rodgers, Rear-Admiral Jenkins, Commodore Semmes, and other officers, as found in the report. In a few cases the committee has found distinguished officers of the Navy, like Chief Constructor Wilson and Chief Engineer Isherwood, who are filled with doubts and fears as to the new ships; but, all things considered, the committee was impressed with the belief that the Chicago, the Boston, the Atlanta, and the Dolphin will make admirable, efficient sea-going cruisers, and that the kinds of ships provided for in this bill, when enough of them shall be built, will give us a valuable cruising navy.

Every one of the questions about which doubt has been raised has been examined with scrupulous care by the naval advisory board, whose conclusions have been approved by the Secretary of the Navy. All the light that could be thrown upon the subject, through the experience of officers who have observed the navies of the world, was at the disposal of this board, and the result of these investigations has been the selection of the classes of vessels now provided for.

It will perhaps be said that, before giving money to build more new ships of the kind now under process of construction, we should wait until these have been fully tried; but the committee believes that no year should pass without some important addition of new vessels to the Navy, and an entire year will be lost by waiting for the completion and trial of the new ships. While the ships provided for in this bill are to be of the same class as those authorized last year, yet it is clear that variations and adaptations will be made as the first set of vessels are brought nearer to completion; so that the ships now provided for will have the benefit of the experience gained in building the first, and I believe that no year should pass without at least six new ships being added to our Navy. I wish it were twice as many, until we have a good navy of steel ships, numbering at least fifty in all.

All these ships will be fast cruisers, attaining a speed ranging from thirteen to sixteen and eighteen miles, and thus far surpassing anything that we have to-day in our Navy. They will be formidable fighting vessels in time of war, and will be able to pursue and overtake nearly every vessel in the merchant marine of any foreign power.

The details of the construction of the ships now building have been most carefully attended to, and all of the papers and memoranda relating to the contracts under which they are being built have been laid before Congress, and are found accompanying the report of the Secretary.

I have given much time and study to this subject, and while I do not now propose to consume the time of the Senate by going further into details, I shall be glad in the course of any debate that may arise to do my best at answering any question that any Senator may raise as to these ships; but I hope that the Senate, without long delay, will see to it that this bill is passed.

Mr. BECK. Shall I interrupt the Senator if I put a question?

Mr. HALE. Not at all.

Mr. BECK. I do not propose to debate this bill, because I am not a member of the Naval Committee and therefore not well enough advised upon the subject. The bill itself does not seem to have any particular guards around it, but gives just a general authority to go and build the ships. Is it proposed that they shall be built in private yards or in the United States navy-yards, or where? The bill does not disclose where they are to be built.

Mr. HALE. I will answer the Senator in a moment upon that very point. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], the dissenting member of the Naval Committee, has introduced an amendment which I presume he will put before the Senate for its action, in which he strikes out seven vessels and inserts four. In doing that he leaves out the 4,500-ton cruiser which is like the Chicago, the 3,000-ton cruiser which is like the Boston and Atlanta, and the 1,500-ton dispatch-boat which is like the Dolphin, and provides only for the building of the four gunboats covered by section 1, and of the ram and torpedo-boats covered by section 2. That is all well so far as it goes, but it is abandoning the leading feature of the bill. It is abandoning the further construction of ships like those we are now building. It is the theory that I have alluded to of "waiting," of doing nothing or almost nothing. I hope that the Senate will not in any way emasculate this bill or cut it down, and if anything is done to it I for one should prefer that it be made greater rather than less.

The sums of money that are called for during the ensuing year by the bill as reported need not alarm any Senator. The entire construction of every vessel covered by the bill during the next two years amounts to only $4,852,000, including hull, machinery, equipment, and ordnance, ready for sea as war cruisers, and only one-half of that will be needed during the coming fiscal year from July 1, 1884, to July 1, 1885. If the bill shall pass untouched, unmolested, Congress will be called upon this year to appropriate but $2,426,000 for the construction of these new ships. Surely the American Senate will not hesitate at an appropriation as limited as that for new additional ships for the American Navy. If it should hesitate at all, it ought to be whether it would not make it double that sum.

In answer to the point raised by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] let me say that the bill has been drawn, as the Senator will see, upon the theory of the act of last year and covers the same classes of vessels. I have an amendment which I propose to offer which subjects the building of these ships to the same regulations and restrictions that were thrown around the building of the ships under the act of March 3, 1883; so that the objection raised by the Senator from Kentucky will be reached by this amendment.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to say that I have raised no objection. I asked the question where these ships were to be built. We have a navy-yard at Mare Island, one at Pensacola, one at Norfolk, one at League Island, one at Brooklyn, one at Boston, and one at Portsmouth, and I do not know whether they are to be built there or whether they are to be built by private contract. I asked the question merely, not being advised.

Mr. HALE. I should not have used the word "objection." The inquiry made by the Senator from Kentucky seemed to be entirely pertinent and fitting, and one that I was very glad to have put, because it called my attention to what I might have forgotten in the course of my remarks.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to say that my interest in the matter is largely of the same kind as that of the Senator from Kentucky, though I do not know that it takes precisely the same direction. I should be glad to know that these ships were not to be built in a Government yard. I have an abiding conviction that we shall not get the highest results of the skill of American mechanics, of American genius, in the construction of ships if we construct them under the directions of the Navy Department in the Government navy-yards. I believe, instead of constructing them there, they ought to be constructed upon such competition as would give the Government the benefit of the best there is of genius and skill as applicable to naval vessels.

Mr. HALE. All of that subject was gone over very thoroughly after the report of the first naval advisory board, and Congress determined in the act of March 3, 1883, the restrictions and regulations that should surround this whole subject-matter. Not one thing can be done by contract outside without advertisement in prominent papers in all parts of the country, without proposals being invited in every direction, without the whole plan and process of construction being submitted to builders everywhere in the United States; and after all the time had been allowed that anybody required bids were put in, and not one step was taken without the bids being submitted to scrutiny and analysis, and the contract being awarded to the lowest bidder. It was believed, and in that opinion I share, that these ships could not be built so well, so cheaply, so quickly in the navy-yards as they could outside, and in that we followed what has been the practice of other naval powers upon the continent of Europe and of Great Britain.

In invoking the attention and interest and sympathy of the Senate for this bill, which as I have said comes from the Naval Committee with I think but one dissenting voice, and that perhaps more with reference to detail and extent than anything else, I wish to say that it is a bill which presents no special appeal to one locality or to one party. It involves the dignity, the self-respect, and it may be the safety of the American Republic. We have gone on for years safely with a dwindling navy. Papers will be put in before this debate closes which will show how that navy has dwindled, how feeble it is to-day, and the man is blind I believe who does not realize that at any time the United States may be called upon to maintain propositions with regard to the American continent, with reference to its influence, with reference to its control, with reference to its transit, upon which the American people are substantially of one mind. I do not believe that it will be possible for the United States for the next twenty-five years to be kept from contact and complication with foreign powers, as it has been fortunately for the last twenty years. The Old World and the New are being brought nearer together every day. Commerce and traffic increase daily; the ocean passage grows shorter; submarine cables bring the two worlds together so far as the doing of business goes; the commerce of the Pacific, to be, very soon it may be, of a magnitude that no man has dreamed of, may be the great prize of the world; and the United States can not afford to lie supinely and let that commerce be monopolized by any European power. To-day a foreign enterprise, with foreign capital, purely under foreign management, has undertaken the task of piercing the isthmus that joins North and South America and letting the two oceans flow together. I, for one, am not prepared to take my position with any party or with any sentiment that will leave this Government powerless and with no means of asserting power whenever the United States shall feel that the day has come for it to announce firmly to other nations that the control of the transit of the American continent can not be left in the hands of any power outside of the American continent.

I do not predict immediate trouble. I wish it were possible that for twenty years to come we could go along without any force in our Navy, without any means of asserting power, without maintaining our dignity whenever any question should arise with any European power. I wish that to my mind were possible. I do not believe it; and I consider that the first duty of the American Congress is to make some fitting preparation, so that if any trouble does arise we may be in a condition to avert war rather than to invite it.

Mr. BECK. I asked a question of the Senator from Maine which he has not answered yet, and about which perhaps we ought to be thoroughly advised. It is in regard to the ships that we propose to build, where they are to be built and how they are to be built. I hardly know now who is building them or what state of progress the ships we are now building are in, but I suppose in the course of the debate we shall ascertain that fact.

In one thing I agree with the Senator from Maine. We have a dwindling navy and a navy that is despicable, I suppose, even to the third-rate powers of the world; but it has not been for want of money given by the Congress of the United States. While the Senator was yet speaking, having some documents before me, I looked at them, and I find this state of facts in the last statistical abstract, page 3: The Congress of the United States has voted to the Navy Department since 1866, after the war, over $385,000,000 to build up a navy with, besides all the old material sold by the Department, which amounted to many millions more. I find by looking at the Secretary's report which I hold in my hand, that from the first foundation of the Government in 1791 up to 1860, during which time we did maintain a respectable navy, all the appropriations ever made to the Navy Department amounted to $336,000,000. Why is the Navy dwindling? We have given more money by nearly $50,000,000 since 1866 to build up our Navy than we had given from the foundation of the Government to the year 1860.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion right there?

Mr. BECK. Of course. I am seeking information.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I think the Senator is simply giving to the Senate information as to the amount of money appropriations made.

Mr. BECK. Yes, I am.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Let me say to my friend that was only a small part of the cost of the Navy during that period. At the close of the war there were some six hundred and odd vessels upon the Navy Register. They have been traded away, broken up, and gone into the hands of favored contractors; they represent in cost to the Government millions and tens of millions of dollars, together with the material of which the Senator speaks that was in the navy-yards at the close of the war. So he can now form something like an approximate idea of the cost of the naval establishment during the period he has named.

Mr. BECK. I am showing that the dwindling Navy has not been for want of money.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BECK. Certainly; I yield to anybody.

Mr. BUTLER. While not exactly upon the point which the Senator is discussing, I think it is somewhat in reply to a question propounded by him to the Senator from Maine as to the manner in which these ships are to be built; if he will pardon me, I will read from the testimony given by Admiral Porter before the Committee on Naval Affairs, and perhaps it will throw some light on that point.

Mr. BECK. I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. BUTLER. I will read only for the purpose of giving information what Admiral Porter said in reply to a question which was put by myself upon that very point. I confess I wanted information. I put the following question to Admiral Porter, to which I will read his reply:

With our present facilities for building ships in this country, how long would it take to get a navy of the size you have just indicated?

Admiral PORTER. It depends altogether on the application of the amount of labor to the work. You go to work and employ the great ship-yards of this country, Cramp in Philadelphia, Harlan & Hollingsworth in Wilmington, John Roach in Chester, and some in the Eastern States and in New York and Boston, and you can soon do it. It is the number of men you put to work; it is the application of labor that solves the question.

Senator BUTLER. But I wanted your judgment as to how long it would take, with the appliances we have in this country now, to get the number of ships you indicated.

Admiral PORTER. I think five years will do the whole of it if you will only give out the contracts and get rid of the idea which most people have that the object in the building of the ships is to make somebody rich. That is all nonsense. Our contractors are as honest as any people in the world, and are as good. They do not overreach the Government half as much as contractors do in foreign countries. If we want fine ships, we must pay pay for them; we can not get them for nothing, and when you have them they will last fifty years. The life of an old ship was eight or nine years before you began to repair her. These splendid large iron ships are going to last forty years longer without any repairs except to the machinery. That is the advantage in having these vessels built of iron.

If it was only to show foreign nations what we could do in an emergency now, it would be worth while to set our ship-yards to work.

They laugh at us and say we can neither go to war nor defend ourselves from attack, because we can not build ships nor make guns.

Senator BUTLER. Admiral, what is the policy of foreign governments, Great Britain, Germany, France, and Italy, in building their ships? Do they build them themselves or do they let them out by contract?

Admiral PORTER. Almost all their ships are built at private establishments by contract. Italy may be excepted in the case of her largest ships.

Senator BUTLER. None built by the government?

Admiral PORTER. There may be some, but as a general rule they do not do so. As a matter of policy Great Britain encourages private ship-building yards. The salvation of the country in case of war would depend on these. We should follow the example of Great Britain.

Senator JONES. Is it so in Great Britain?

Admiral PORTER. They are built by private individuals. Their navy-yards are fitting yards. They fit out vessels in the navy-yards, but they are built by the best builders in the country, and that policy ought to be pursued in this country. As I said before, when war comes then we would have these great ship-building places with their plant which had accumulated during peace. The navy-yards should be used altogether for fitting purposes. I am opposed to building ships in Government yards.

Senator BUTLER. Is there a navy-yard in the United States that could build a ship out and out now?

Admiral PORTER. There is. I had one built in a navy-yard once, and I assure you when I got through with her I weighed about forty pounds less than I did when I started; but we could build these in case of necessity.

Senator JONES. Whose fault was that?

Admiral PORTER. She was a very small vessel. She cost $460,000 built at a navy-yard, and she could have been built at an outside establishment for $200,000 without any trouble at all. I know this certainly, because they charged everything to that small vessel. They charged one item alone of $80,000, work put on the Trenton, and other things of the same kind. One item, I think, was a hot-house for some one in the navy-yard.

Senator BUTLER. That becomes a very important fact, it seems to me.

Admiral PORTER. You can never ascertain what a ship costs in a navy-yard.

Senator JONES. What do you attribute that difference in cost to?

Admiral PORTER. Politics. That is about the fact of it. The navy-yards are very much used for political purposes, and very naturally. If I was a politician I suppose I would do the same thing. If I could get my friends into the navy-yards, I presume I should do as others do; but at the same time, if I was in charge of the yard I would do all I could to stop it. But what I say is the fact, and it causes a great deal of the expense.

That is rather upon the line of the inquiry propounded by the Senator from Kentucky as to where these ships would be built and how they should be built. As I remember the testimony of some one of the gentlemen who came before us, I think he made the statement that there was not a navy-yard in this country that could complete a vessel out and out.

Mr. BECK. I suppose that accounts, especially the latter clauses of it, for how a good deal of the $385,000,000 that we have voted away in the last seventeen or eighteen years has gone.

Mr. BUTLER. Possibly so.

Mr. BECK. They charged $80,000 to the Trenton when it did not go to the ship at all. Perhaps many other eighty thousands had been charged that did not go to the ships at all.

Mr. BUTLER. There was one charge for a hot-house.

Mr. ALLISON. Did I understand the Senator from Kentucky——

Mr. BECK. I am making no charges.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course not; but I did not understand from the statement read that the $80,000 was not expended on the Trenton.

Mr. BUTLER. No.

Mr. BECK. It was charged to something else.

Mr. ALLISON. It was not the Trenton that was being built. Eighty thousand dollars of the $400,000 was expended on the Trenton and not on the vessel Admiral Porter speaks of.

Mr. BECK. It was said to be charged to that vessel, just as a great many things are charged to one account that go to another, and if $80,000 could go to the Trenton, $80,000 could go to elect a member of Congress, could it not, and be charged just as well to that other ship? I understand that is the way it goes.

However, I meant to say that we have given $385,000,000 since 1866, besides all the vast material which the Senator from New Jersey has explained, and besides all the ships that have been sold, and when we prevented them from selling ships they broke up old ships and sold them as old scrap, and that money was taken as well. It is because we can not get the money properly applied that Congress is in difficulty about having a navy. I find further in the report now submitted to us that we have ninety-two vessels, all told, belonging to the Navy to-day. Of these, thirty-one are in commission. Of the thirty-one now in commission, three second-rates and thirteen third-rates were built since 1866 out of this $385,000,000. All the rest were built before, out of money otherwise appropriated, making thirteen built since 1866 and fifteen built before out of the ninety-two.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him, merely for information, if that $385,000,000 embraced every description of appropriation for the Navy Department?

Mr. BECK. Oh, yes; I said for the Navy Department.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The pay of officers and everything?

Mr. BECK. Everything; and so did the $336,000,000 appropriated up to 1860 include everything.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It is not confined merely to ship-building?

Mr. BECK. Oh, no. The statement here is made that the original cost of all the ships from the foundation of the Government up to the close of the year 1833 was $40,796,612.92, and the repairs since then $41,200,822.13, making a total of $81,997,435.05 for ships and repairs, all told. That is the table that is furnished us with this bill. When the Senator from Maine announces that we have a constantly dwindling navy that is a disgrace to us, I assume that a great deal of that disgrace grows out of the fact that the money has not been properly applied. It has built up navy-yards, but it has not built up navies.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Let me call the Senator's attention, as I have it here now, as it will be more fitting at present than afterward, to the restrictions and regulations that are thrown around the building of ships provided for last year, and which will be thrown around these provided the amendment which I have indicated I shall offer is adopted by the Senate.

In the act of August 5, 1882, and I think the Senator and myself more than any others framed that act, the restriction is provided in detail on different pages of the act, because it is made complete and exhaustive, that every step taken in building these ships shall be under the advice of the advisory board; that no contract shall be made until submitted to it; and then it goes on and declares that—

Before any of the vessels hereby authorized shall be contracted for or commenced the Secretary of the Navy shall, by proper public advertisement and notice, invite all engineers and mechanics of established reputation, and all reputable manufacturers of vessels, steam-engines, boilers, and ordnance, having or controlling regular establishments, and being engaged in the business, all officers of the Navy, and especially all naval constructors, steam-engineers, and ordnance officers of the Navy, having plans, models, or designs of any vessels of the classes hereby authorized, or of any part thereof, within any given period, not less than sixty days, to submit the same to said board; and it shall be the duty of said board to carefully and fully examine the same and to hear any proper explanation thereof, and to report to the Secretary of the Navy, in writing, whether, in their opinion, any such plan, model, or design, or any suggestion therein, is worthy of adoption in the construction of said vessels, their engines, boilers, or armament.

Then it goes on, as the Senator will find if he looks at it, or if he revives his recollection he will recall his own part in framing it, and provides that there shall be bids regularly received, scrutinized, and chosen, so that the whole thing is guarded and surrounded and controlled by as much of scrutiny and care as it was possible for Congress to give to it. The amendment which I shall offer will put these vessels in the same category as those were.
